FEEs IN BANKRUPTCY.—Mr. Serjeant Manning, in his proposal to the Lord Chancellor for the amendment of the law of bankruptcy and insolvency, makes the following observations on the payment of fees in bankruptcy:—"It has been matter of complaint against the present system of bankruptcy, that in small bankruptcies the costs and other expenses attending the obtaining, the opening, and the working of the fiat, form a heavy charge upon the assets, and sometimes entirely absorb them; and the expense of administering an estate under a bankruptcy has been contrasted with the inexpensive proceedings of the Court of Insolvent Debtors, where estates, of which the assets have been only 12l. have been able to yield a dividend. This disadvantageous contrast, however, arises merely from the fact that the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors is provided by the State, while the Court of Bankruptcy is supported by those who have need of its assistance, and the creditors not only bear the actual expenses of administering the estate, but are bound to make heavy payments towards the compensation receivable by the holders of sinecure offices. A person suing a debtor who is in circumstances which will enable him to pay the full amount of debt and costs, if the claim made upon him be established, finds courts of law and courts of equity provided by the State, and judges paid out of the Consolidated Fund, ready to do him justice; but if the debtor is only able to pay 1s. in the pound, instead of 20s. the creditor, according to the present system in bankruptcy, must, through the medium of fees, provide a court at his own expense, and pay the judges himself. That a creditor of a solvent debtor should be enabled to enforce his demand in courts paid by the State, appears to be most reasonable, inasmuch as the advantages derived to the public from the indirect operation of courts of law in deterring from, and in preventing injustice, are of incalculably greater importance than any benefits obtained by individual suitors, who, at great hazard, seek redress for injustice actually committed; but there seems to be no reason for treating more unfavourably those who come before a Court because they have already sustained a loss, or for saying to the all but ruined creditor, 'Qui sentit incommodum sentire debet et onus.'" The learned serjeant proposes the following remedy:—"I therefore suggest that the salaries of the judges and officers of the court should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, and that the payments to sinecure officers should be transferred to the same fund. I further suggest, that in every insolvency, whether carried through the court, or terminated by a registered letter of license, &c. five per cent. should be deducted out of the sums distributable amongst the creditors, and paid into a fee fund; and that at the end of each half-year the amount received into the fee fund during the half-year should be applied in part discharge of the bills of costs taxed during the half-year, in proportion to the amount of such bills of costs, without regard to the amount of the assets of each individual estate; the money so applied not to exceed two-thirds of such bills of cost, and any surplus remaining to be added to the fee fund of the succeeding half-year."

THE MAGISTRATE.

Summary.

NOTHING has occurred during the week that requires particular notice.

CRIME.—In the report presented to the watch committee by Capt. Willis, the chief constable, the total number of persons apprehended during the year 1845, for offences of every description committed in the borough, is set down at 9,635, viz.:—6,943 males, and 2,722 females, of whom 3,851 were discharged by the magistrates. By far the greatest number were charged with drunkenness, 2,185 having been apprehended whilst drunk and inebriate, and 2,003 drunk and disorderly. The next in point of number were persons charged with common assaults, who are stated to be 771; after whom appear 623 apprehended for larceny in houses, shops, and warehouses. One person only was apprehended on each of the following charges:—coining, being at large under sentence of transportation, cruelty to animals, and offending against the Mutiny Act. Amongst the entire number of 9,635, only 21 were found to have received a superior education, whilst 3,499 had received no instruction whatever, being unable either to read or write; 5,536 are stated to have been able to read, or read and write imperfectly, and 579 able to read and write well. The countries to which they severally belong are thus given:—English, 6,944; Irish, 2,279; Scotch, 231; Welsh, 135; the remaining 46 were foreigners from various countries.—Manchester Courier.

THE LAWYER.

Summary.

AGAIN we can only point to the huge mass of reports assembled in this double number, as containing the really important intelligence. Some of the decisions will be found to be of great interest, and requiring the instant attention of the practitioner. For the reasons stated in another place, this double number is presented at the charge of a single one.

The increase of aisi prius business in London is keeping pace with its diminution in the country. The cause is probably that the facility of railway communication makes the metropolis as ready of access as the assize town, with the advantage of less cost of living, and the convenience of an arrangement by which attorneys and witnesses are not compelled to be idling about the court for a week waiting their turn. But it is a pity that this business is not more equally divided. The Exchequer had upwards of 150 causes entered for the present sittings, while the other Courts had comparatively few. Why the attorneys should prefer to take their business into the Exchequer is a mystery. It offers no single advantage, and many disadvantages.

LEGAL INTELLIGENCE.

Re W. BROMLEY.

BANKRUPTCY COURT, JUNE 12.—This bankrupt, an attorney in Gray's Inn, came up upon special application for his adjourned last examination. The debts and liabilities are stated to be nearly 200,000*l.*, and the only dividend as yet paid is 1*l.* in the pound, but considerable assets are expected to be realized. The whole of the proceedings in this complicated case were reported about two and a half years ago, when the case was heard and adjourned sine die by the late Sir C. F. Williams, certain conditions being then imposed upon the bankrupt, and when several alleged breaches of trust were imputed to him.

Wilde, as counsel for the assignees, opposed the present application.

Mr. Bromley said it was merely an adjournment sine die, with liberty to come up again at his own expense.

His HONOUR observed that as the conditions were not filed with the proceedings, he could not take cognizance of them. Were he to go through the balance-sheet, nothing having been added to it since it was adjudicated upon, he should be reviewing the decision of Sir Charles Williams; and that he could not do. He thought that the only thing he could do was to again adjourn the case sine die.

A lengthened discussion here took place between the learned counsel, the bankrupt, and a person named Bolt, who claimed to be a creditor, although set down in the bankrupt's balance-sheet as a debtor to a very considerable amount.

The learned Commissioner said that Mr. Bromley should give an account of the state of his affairs as nearly as he could at the time of the dissolution of partnership with his brother.

Mr. Bromley was afraid that he could furnish no further accounts than he had already done.

His HONOUR.—You can try.

Mr. Bromley.—I will do so, your Honour.

Wilde asked that the bankrupt's account of the state of his affairs should commence five years before the issue of the fiat, inasmuch as he was an attorney, and the allegations against him chiefly consisted of breaches of trust. His case was not like that of an ordinary tradesman, who perhaps could not furnish an account of the state of his affairs for five years before his bankruptcy or insolvency, inasmuch as his business was liable to fluctuation, not as in the case of Bromley, who was always using (as alleged) other persons' money.

His HONOUR ordered that this account should be filed, and the case was adjourned.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—IMPORTANT CASE UNDER THE SMALL DEBTS ACT.—Mr. Dinn, from the office of Mr. Engleheart, of Doctors' Commons, stated that he had to apply to the Court under these circumstances:—A short time since, Francis Willmott, a workman in Deptford dockyard, was summoned, under the Small Debts Act, to this court, for 4*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.* debt, and 5*l.* 9*s.* costs, on a judgment recovered by Mr. James Price, a baker, of Blackheath-hill. His Honour made an order upon the defendant to pay 10*s.* per month, but he had failed to keep up his payments, and consequently a warrant of commitment was issued, and placed in the hands of Joshua Morris, the sheriff's officer of Greenwich, who refused, however, to execute it, and, therefore, all the proceedings were stultified. The Commissioner: What do you want to do?—Mr. Dinn: That is the difficulty, and I wish for your Honour's advice. Would your Honour object to the warrant being directed to the messenger of the court?—The Commissioner: I cannot allow that. The messenger was appointed to attend to matters in bankruptcy, and not to go running all over Kent to find an insolvent debtor.—Mr. Dinn: It has been suggested that the sheriff's officer should be brought here for having committed a contempt of court. Can I have a summons against him to compel him to shew cause why he does not execute your Honour's warrant?—The Commissioner: Shew me that the Act gives me the power to assist you, and I will do so. My own opinion is that he has rendered himself liable to an indictment; but I am not a common-law lawyer, and you must go to them who framed this Act. When I was appointed a commissioner, it was upon the assumption that I was acquainted with bankruptcy law, and not small debt acts and insolvent debtors.—Mr. Dinn: It is a very hard case upon my client. Here is a fraudulent debtor acting us at defiance, and laughing at an Act of Parliament.—The Commissioner: Then why do you not go to the Secretary of State, and represent the circumstance to him; and if Sir James Graham refuses to assist you, you may get a member of Parliament to present a petition to relieve you from your difficulty.—Mr. Dinn: Yes; but it is difficult to get a creditor to take that trouble.—The Commissioner: Then if creditors will not bestir themselves, I can do nothing for them. Why not go to the association which has been formed to prosecute fraudulent debtors, and represent to them that your case to-day may be theirs to-morrow, and ask them to interfere?—Mr. Dinn: Does your Honour not think that, under the Act, you are compelled to direct the warrant to your messenger?—The Commissioner: No; and, if I do wrong, you can complain against me, and then I shall have an opportunity of explaining my views of this Act of Parliament to the Legislature. I shall not have the slightest objection to be brought before the House of Commons for this purpose. After some further discussion, the Court declined to interfere, and Mr. Dinn expressed his determination to address the Secretary of State upon the subject. It may be mentioned that Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque positively refuses to allow these warrants to be executed by anybody but the messenger of his court, and which sometimes is attended with very heavy expenses for travelling, &c. So much for the uniformity, in these courts, of the administration of law, and the construction to be placed upon the provisions of the statute in question.

EXECUTION OF WARRANTS OF ATTORNEY.—Re JOHN HARLOW.—The bankrupt, who attended to pass his last examination, had for years kept a cigar shop, at No. 9, Leicester-square. Mr. Nicholas, barrister, appeared for a creditor residing at Vienna; and Mr. Lawrence, solicitor, was for the bankrupt; an attorney, named Bedford, represented Mr. Fryer, tobacco manufacturer. It appeared that the bankrupt in 1842 was discharged under the Insolvent Debtors Act, and now he was a bankrupt. Mr. Fryer was a creditor on the two occasions, during which time he carried on business in Leicester-square, and from 1842 to 1845 Mr. Fryer's name was over the door, and he had acted as his servant. In September, 1845, they changed positions; and Mr. Fryer refused to give him a warrant of attorney for 1,500*l.* which included the old debt under the insolvency. A warrant of attorney was placed before him, and, in order to claim the business, he signed the same. He had to find an attorney who would witness the instrument. Several objected, and at last he found an attorney, who attested his signature for 13*s.* 4*d.*—Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque regretted that an attorney was to be found who would attest a signature under such circumstances. It was in fraud of the Act and the regulations of the superior courts. The object of the Act was to prevent an attorney who might be picked up from witnessing such an instrument. The attorney for Mr. Fryer assured the commissioner that it was a common practice. Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque said the frequency of the practice did not make it respectable. He could not too strongly condemn the practice. On the part of Mr. Fryer, it was stated that the bankrupt had the warrant of attorney some days in his possession before he executed it. The bankrupt positively denied the allegation.

THE INNER TEMPLE BENCHERS.—Mr. Hayward's appeal was partly heard on Monday last. The whole question turns on the power of the judges to call on the benchers to exercise a sound discretion in the conduct of their elections; and the grand object of Sir Charles Wetherell (who appeared for the bench) seemed to be to shut out inquiry by technical objections. The course pursued by the Bench of driving Mr. Hayward to prove a strict legal claim is universally condemned; and it is pointedly asked whether, if he had been excluded from a circuit mess by a misrepresentation, the members would have refused to repair their error on the ground that no legal remedy was open to him. The worst thing that could happen to the bench would be an abandonment of the jurisdiction by the judges; for, in that case, a select committee will immediately be moved for to inquire into the affair and consider the constitution of these bodies, who are intrusted with very large powers of a public character. All moral weight and influence that ought to attach to the decisions of the bench are already forfeited. The excluding power, as exercised by the other inns, may operate usefully as a check; as exercised at the Inner Temple (by ballot, preceded by secret calumny) it can serve only to bring the institution into contempt.—Examiner.

ABOLITION OF THE EARLY DELIVERY.—The following order, with reference to the early delivery of letters in the metropolis, was posted in the letter-carriers' branch of the inland office a few minutes before 8 o'clock on Monday evening:—"Order of the Postmaster-General, June 13, 1846.—On the 25th inst. the early delivery on the city walks will be discontinued. The sub-posters who deliver the city walks will, on and after that date, act as assistant letter-carriers on their respective walks. Mr. Kelly will make proper arrangements to carry these regulations into effect. To insure the above order of his lordship being carried into complete operation with the smallest possible inconvenience to the public, the letter-carriers holding such walks will prepare statements of the present deliveries, so that they may be equalized and regulated in compliance with the above order. In order that all employed on the walks may be thoroughly acquainted with every part of this order, it is intended that the letter-carriers and their assistants, as the case may be, shall be changed to the different divisions of the same walks periodically." The operation of the above "order" will save the merchants and traders of the metropolis upwards of 2,000*l.* per annum. Extensive changes in the management must also follow it, as the chief part of the men in the city walks depend principally upon the public for their incomes, the "Crown pay" of the senior men being only 30*l.* 5*s.* per annum, or 14*s.* per week.

A KNOTTY POINT.—Three years ago, says a Paris paper, the courts and tribunals of Austria were consulted upon the "knotty" question, whether there was reason to change the mode of executing capital sentences, and substituting decapitation for suspension. Their reply was for the rejection of decollation (as practised in France), for the principal reason, that it accustomed the people to the sight of blood; but at the same time they expressed a wish that some modification might be made in the prevailing system of strangulation, which tortured the victim too much. A year ago a surgeon of the University of Padua proposed to the Government a new method of strangulation, for which he took care to have himself breveted. This method chiefly consisted of a mechanism which, when the criminal was fastened to the gibbet, drew him violently by the feet and the head, occasioned the dislocation of the vertebral column on the level of the neck, and this occasioned instantaneous death. This method, after being tried for one year, has just been definitively adopted in the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, and the surgeon who invented it has, to the great surprise of his companions and compatriots, accepted the "honourable" office of "director of executions," over which he will be bound to preside, in order to superintend the application of his plan.

THE WILL OF CHARLES GREGORY FAIRFAX, Esq., of Gilling Castle, Yorkshire, has just been proved. He has devised the castle of Gilling, with its rights and royalties, and also the manor of Coulton, in Yorkshire, together with the mills, parks, warrens, lands, tenements, tithes, and hereditaments, in Gilling, Coulton, Ampleford, Yearsley, and Grimston, to his son, Charles Gregory Fairfax, and to his issue; on failure, to his two daughters and their issue; on failure, to his son-in-law, Francis Cholmeley, esq. of Brandsly Hall, Yorkshire, and that the person hereafter becoming entitled in progression, not being of the same name, shall apply for the royal license to use the surname of Fairfax, and quarter with their own the family arms. He has bequeathed to his daughters pecuniary legacies, as well as to his executors, Thomas Meynell, jun. and James Russell, both of York.

PROCEEDINGS OF LAW SOCIETIES.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW.

General Meeting, May 20, 1846.

Sir JOHN STODDART, LL.D. in the Chair.

The minutes of the last meeting (the 6th inst.) were read and confirmed. The following members were balloted for and elected: The Lord Beaumont; the Lord Advocate, M.P.; Captain Dawson, R.E.; and James Moncrief, esq. Advocate.

The second report of the Committee on the Law of Property on the following reference was presented: "To consider of the propriety of establishing a general Register of Deeds and Instruments affecting Real Property, and for this purpose to adapt the machinery similar to that of the public funds for the transfer of real property." It was agreed that the report should be printed and further considered at the next meeting.

General Meeting, June 3, 1846.

Mr. COMMISSIONER FANE in the Chair.

The minutes of the last meeting (the 20th of May last) were read and confirmed. The second report of the Committee on the Law of Property on the following reference: "To consider of the propriety of establishing a general Register of Deeds and Instruments affecting Real Property," was ordered to be received.

The following reference was made to the Committee on the Law of Property: "To consider whether, in connection with a General Register, the principle of insurance of titles might not be introduced."

MEETING OF THE ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS OF IRELAND.

On the 12th inst. a meeting of the members of the above Profession was held at Plunket's Buildings, Wincetavern-street, pursuant to requisition, for the purpose of "giving expression to the general feeling of respect and esteem entertained towards Frederick Jackson, esq. by the entire body of the Profession, of all parties and of all creeds." The chair was taken by T. O'REILLY, Esq.

Mr. M'EVoy GARTLAN said that the purpose for which they had assembled there was neither to abuse Mr. Butt nor pass eulogiums on Mr. Jackson, but, as members of a Profession, to express their perfect concurrence in the line of conduct which had been adopted by the latter on a late occasion in defending the rights of the Profession to which he belonged, and their intention of on all occasions supporting every member of that profession who stood up as he had done in defence of its privileges, no matter what might be his religion or politics. He (Mr. G.) did not even know Mr. Jackson personally, and believed that he widely differed with him in religion and politics. That it was a bad principle that a man should be attacked who possessed not any legitimate means of defending himself, and that the attack should go forth to the public when the accused was equally without the power of defending himself before them, was what they (the meeting) had now to affirm. What means of defence had Mr. Jackson had from the attack which had been made upon him, when his counsel remained silent upon the delivery of the observations conveying it, and the Bench did not interfere? He (Mr. G.) could not see that he had any. He was no duellist or advocate of duelling; but he asked them what other way had a gentleman of avenging himself when an unprovoked and unfounded attack was made on him in a court of justice? Mr. Gartlan concluded by moving the first resolution.

Mr. THOMAS WRIGHT seconded the resolution.

Mr. SCOTT observed that, considering the manner in which that meeting had been convened, they ought to consider before they deemed the resolutions which should be passed at it resolutions of the Profession at large.

Mr. CANTWELL said that, but for the observation which Mr. Scott had just made, he would not have spoken. With great respect to him, he did not think that he was justified in considering that meeting as anything but a meeting of the attorneys of Ireland. He (Mr. C.) admitted having been inclined to think that the meeting should be convened in the rooms of the Society of Attorneys; but the opinion which he had entertained on that point had been much shaken by the gratuitous insult which was in the advertisement that had appeared from the committee that morning. That advertisement had virtually announced to the public that the Society of Attorneys did not comprehend within it all, or represent, the attorneys at large. However the locus in quo their resolutions should be adopted, was a matter totally below the consideration of that meeting. He was sorry that that meeting was not as numerous as it ought to be, or indeed would have been, if the Society of Attorneys had relaxed from their rule, as they might have done, and attached proper importance to the discussion of the matter which had brought that meeting together. There were one or two observations of his friend, Mr. Gartlan, with which he did not quite concur. He (Mr. Cantwell) thought that that meeting should carefully avoid interfering with what were private considerations between Mr. Butt and Mr. Jackson—whether Mr. Butt was right or Mr. Jackson was wrong, was utterly beside what was to occupy their attention. But they had before them this, that the Court of Queen's Bench, after a solemn investigation, had pronounced that Mr. Jackson had only uprightly and properly discharged his professional duty; and in the face of that tribunal they had found a man of professional rank and eminence insisting on this monstrous proposition, that it was the privilege of the profession of the Bar to assail attorneys, perfectly irrespective of whether they deserved it or not, and perfectly regardless of whether they were discharging their duty or not; and declaring that if his profession was not left at liberty to adopt that course, it would be a degraded profession. How much more degraded would their profession be, if its members were obliged to succumb to such a proposition! They were not now called on to do more than would become them on that occasion; and he thought the moral of that meeting should be felt to be this, that they were determined not to suffer attacks on such a principle as it had, on the part of the Bar, been attempted to affirm. The judges of the land had, thanks to them, negatived it. And recollect these powerful observations of the Lord Chief Justice—they should be stereotyped for the benefit of the attorneys' profession—"that it was certainly a circumstance to be considered that these observations had been made in the presence of two judges of the land," and "it was to be remembered that the party had not complained of it at the time." There were enunciated in these observations two important things, and material to the protection of their profession. First, that two judges of the land had permitted observations to be made which four judges had afterwards declared ought not to have been made. Secondly, an intimation that on every future occasion when observations of a severe character were made upon an attorney, he should at once appeal to the Court to restrain the speaker, in case his topics were not warranted by evidence.

A GENTLEMAN, who had just entered the room, stated that he had had a conversation with Mr. Jackson, in which the latter stated that he felt extremely obliged to the Profession for the sympathy which they felt for him, but would, at the same time, request that that meeting should not carry on any further proceedings.

It was, however, considered that the meeting were at liberty to proceed independently of Mr. Jackson's wishes, and the resolution was accordingly put from the chair, and carried.

Mr. MILLS moved, and Mr. CROWLEY seconded, the next resolution, which was put and carried.

The usual thanks were then passed to the chairman, after which the meeting separated.

Proposed by PETER M. E. GARTLAN; seconded by THOMAS EDMUND WRIGHT, Esq.:

Resolved—That whilst we disclaim the remotest intention of interfering in, or making matter of discussion any part of the recent transaction between Messrs. Butt and Jackson which could be regarded as personal between these gentlemen, yet we feel called upon to express our conviction that in that transaction, and many of its consequential details, there were involved elements and considerations materially and interestingly affecting the position and privileges of this Profession, and that Mr. Jackson is entitled to the thanks of his brethren for the manner in which he defended that position and maintained those privileges.

Proposed by HENRY MILLS, Esq.; seconded by JAMES COWLEY, Esq.:

Resolved—That we deprecate in the strongest terms the unlimited privilege of irresponsible personal abuse claimed for the members of the Bar, and so unsparingly employed by some of them against the members of our Profession and the public, in matters connected with the exercise of our arduous and onerous duties; and that it is our firm determination, by all the means in our power, and upon all occasions, to discountenance and discourage so unconstitutional, so unfair, and so offensive a practice. —Saunders's News Letter.

UNITED LAW CLERKS' SOCIETY.—The fourteenth annual celebration took place at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, Mr. Baron Platt in the chair, supported by upwards of 150 gentlemen. The objects of this society are to establish a general benefit fund, for rendering liberal pecuniary assistance in the events of sickness, inability, through age or other infirmity, to earn the means of subsistence, and on the death of a member or member's wife. Also a casual fund to afford assistance by loans and gifts to law clerks, whether members or not, and their widows in temporary distress; to provide situations for law clerks generally, and the profession with efficient and respectable clerks; to form a library of useful legal works, and to register situations. The health of the Queen and the Queen Dowager having been given in succession, and received with the usual acclamations, the chairman proposed the health of Prince Albert and the rest of the Royal family; and in proposing this toast, the chairman thought it a favourable occasion to call to the minds of the company that his Royal Highness had recently become a bencher, and that, therefore, this society had a fair claim to look forward to the patronage and aid of his Royal Highness to assist his professional brethren. (Cheers and laughter.) The annual report was then read by the secretary, which gave a very favourable account of the condition of the society. They have upwards of 8,500l. funded; and in the last year their increased addition to the fund exceeded 1,100l. being a larger addition than in any previous year. Their subscriptions and donations had also progressively increased; and, although the demands on the funds were considerable, no applicant had been left unrelied, and no debt unliquidated. In fact, there appeared to be the best prospect of the society prospering to a high degree; and to accomplish that object it only required the co-operation of the law-clerks themselves generally, as a body, with the patronage they had already been so fortunate as to have received. The report was universally approved of, and the chairman immediately proposed the toast of the evening, "Prosperity to the United Law Clerks' Society;" and, in recommending the toast to the consideration of the company, the chairman dwelt with much effect on the valuable services of the class of men for whose advantage this society was founded, on whose integrity and strict attention to their employers' business depended so much the interests not only of that employer, but of the public at large. Mr. Phipson responded to the toast, after which the healths of the Lord Chancellor, and the other patrons of the society, were proposed by Mr. Fortescue, and received with acclamation; and then followed the health of the chairman, proposed by Mr. James, which was drunk with three times three, and immense cheers. To this succeeded several other routine toasts, and the conviviality of the evening was kept up to a reasonable time. The dinner and wines were very good.

ARTICLED CLERKS' SOCIETY.

THE Committee of this Society had an interview yesterday with Mr. WYSE, M.P. the Chairman of the Committee of the House of Commons now sitting on the subject of Legal Education, when the hon. member promised to bring their proposition for the improvement of the education of articled clerks under the consideration of the committee.

CORRESPONDENCE.

REFORMS IN CONVEYANCING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—I have read with attention the proceedings of the Society for promoting the Amendment of the Law, reported in your number of the 13th instant, more particularly with reference to the question of conveyancing; as also your own remarks, and Mr. Chamberlain's letter on the subject. The recent grounds on which the society founds its argument for reforms in conveyancing, appear to arise from the report of a committee of the House of Lords, met to consider the burdens on land. I by no means think this an unprejudiced tribunal, composed as it is of parties anticipating a loss, and willing to make any persons they can lay hold of contribute to their indemnity. I certainly was astounded at Mr. Baxter's assertion, that the average charge for mortgages of 50l. was thirty per cent. &c. Who Mr. Baxter is, or whether he is a professional man, I know not; but if he is, I can only say that I wonder he has ever had clients sufficient to enable him to take an average of his exorbitant charges. If he is not, then he has been grossly imposed upon. This, however, is a specimen of the fair way in which law expenses are computed. Mr. Chamberlain hits the right nail on the head. It is the unfair distribution of stamp duties, and the unwillingness of the legislature to revise these laws, that press heavily on attorney and client. But I deny that law expenses affect in any sensible degree the value of land, which is governed by causes of a fluctuating and uncertain nature. If this were not the case, the value of land would be the same in all years and in all places, which is notoriously not the case. As to Lord Campbell's exaggerations, it seems as if he and Mr. Baxter must have derived their information from the same quarter. If ever the parchment of a conveyance covered the property it transferred, it must be in the same manner as Queen Dido managed at Carthage, when she cut the bull's hide into strips. Really, if the profits of law are so great, how happens it that the Profession is not much richer than it is. Doctor's Commons, and the Probate and Legacy Duties Office, do not encourage the belief that attorneys accumulate large fortunes. This, however, is no argument against reform, and, as I have said before, I am by no means opposed to it. But I still think the mode of proceeding, and the parties who intrust themselves with it, are not the best qualified to carry out the project judiciously or impartially. Lord Brougham says they are called a "dilettanti society," and refers with triumph to its members and the acts they have given birth to. A most unfortunate allusion. Every act they have produced has either been repealed or most copiously amended, in the same or the following session, and, in spite of Lord Brougham's assertion, are not much favoured by the Profession, because most of what they have done well was in practice done before, and a great part of what is unrepealed is a dead letter. Lord Brougham does not approve of reviving the real property commission, and yet, with due deference to his lordship, the acts emanating from this Board were models of legislation, and accomplished what they proposed, being undertaken by men competent in every way to their task. Their measures were not struck off currente calamo, to be introduced into Parliament with hot haste, but were matured under the midnight oil, in the retirement and quiet of chambers, and were "written, re-written, and written again."

To whom, then, are these changes to be intrusted, and by whom are they to be effected? We are agreed as to the expediency of yielding to the general prepossession in favour of change; but who is to protect the interests of the Profession? There is but one body which presents itself to the mind,—the Law Institution. What is this corporation about? Is it paralysed? Is it frightened? For what was it instituted? Why did the Profession hail its formation as an Aegis against abuses and aggression? If not the Law Institution, then who is to be the protector of the Profession? If you agree with me that the Law Institution is called upon to exert itself at this juncture, and that the Profession is dissatisfied with its inefficiency, either in a protective or in any other capacity, then I trust you will use your powerful voice in calling on it to "sleep no more," for dull indeed will it be if it will not stir in this.

I am yours, &c.

SHAM ATTORNEYS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—I think if all professional men were to add "Solicitor," or "Attorney-at-Law," to their signatures to all letters, &c. and to make it publicly known that such was the new rule of the Profession, it would check Sham Attorneys more than any thing else; as without the word "Solicitor" their letters would be mere waste paper; and if they used the word, I presume they would become amenable to the law.

The letters of Sham Attorneys only have effect because people think they are real attorneys; therefore I opine, by the proposed plan, professional men may defeat the ends of the Sham Attorneys.

I am, Sir, &c.

SELECTIONS FROM CORRESPONDENCE.

A "COUNTRY SUBSCRIBER" transmits the following just and too frequent complaints:—

Some London attorneys are in the frequent habit of sending me writs to serve for them in the country; I serve the writs, but seldom get paid. What do you advise me to do in order to get paid?

I was thinking of making out a list of them, and inserting it in your columns, so that other country attorneys may know that when they have writs sent them by any names in the list, they will not be paid, and decline transacting the business.

"LEX" thus notices the recent important decision in Cocker v. Musgrave:—

In addition to the erroneous practice shewn by the judgment in Cocker v. Musgrave to have been hitherto followed under the Act 8 Anne, c. 14, there is I think another point on which the practice under that Act has been contrary to its true construction. It is the invariable practice in case of an execution, and of a claim being made by the landlord for his rent, to give him the priority over the execution creditor, notwithstanding the debtor does not hold under a lease, but is merely an occupier of the premises as tenant thereof, under a parol or written agreement, or under some other understanding between him and his landlord. Now, on perusing the Act, it seems to me, and I submit the point for the consideration of the Profession, that in such a case a landlord can only have the benefit of that Act where there is an actual lease, and not where there is only an agreement, even though such agreement may be a written one.

"AN ATTORNEY," at Preston, submits a query to which many besides himself would be very glad of a satisfactory reply.

I shall be greatly obliged if any of your numerous readers can inform me how an account for agency (under 40s.) can be recovered from a solicitor in one of the large towns of Yorkshire?

SATURDAY, JUNE 20, 1846.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

It was stated some time since that strict faith would be observed with subscribers as to the Advertisements. It was promised that, for whatever space they should exceed the pages allotted to them, compensation should be made to the reader. As the number of advertisements varies at different seasons, it is impossible to prescribe any limit to them, and usually they will not permit of postponement. It was, therefore, agreed that an account should be kept, and whatever they trespassed upon the reader's domain should be supplied by gratuitous additional pages. In pursuance of this pledge, the subscriber is to-day presented with a GRATIS double number, which not only enables us to meet a portion of the mass of reports sent in, but to provide for a flood of Advertisements, and balance the account due for past trespasses upon the reader's good nature.

CONDUCT OF THE COURTS.

It is with considerable reluctance, and only after long hesitation and repeated deliberation as to the precise line of public duty in a Professional Journal, that we have come to the conclusion that we should be neglecting that duty were we to be silent upon a subject of complaint which is matter of general remark in private, but which no individual presumes to prefer publicly. That which would be deemed impertinent in an individual, will, perhaps, be received as kindly as it is meant from a journal that represents the general opinion in this matter.

Let us state frankly then, that the complaint which, lest the motive be mistaken, we have thus prefaced, is the habit into which the Barons of the Exchequer have fallen, of incessant interruptions of Counsel in the course of their arguments, converting, in fact, what should be a formal argument into a dialogue, to the serious diminution of the dignity of the Court, and the grievous vexation of those who are thus forced into a sort of half examination, half controversy, not with one judge only, but often with two or three at once. Sure we are that the learned Barons of the Exchequer, who have fallen into this habit probably from the very kindness of their dispositions, cannot form the slightest conception of the strange effect it has upon the spectator, or the inconvenience it occasions to Counsel. The latter goes down prepared with an argument complete, each step being necessary to be proved in order to support that which is to follow. Instead of being permitted to put that argument uninterrupted after his own fashion, he has scarcely opened it but objections and interrogatories are interposed, now from one judge, now from another, and often from two at once, until the links in the chain of his reasoning are utterly lost, and, perplexed, confused, not knowing what first to answer, or how to pass an opinion in an instant upon the many supposititious cases thrown out to him, the baffled Counsel is compelled to resume his seat, with his real argument unspoken, and the merits of his own case undeveloped.

That this is not an exaggerated picture we believe will be allowed by all who have spoken or sat in that Court, and its mischiefs are so apparent, that it will, we are confident, be enough to state the fact to ensure an alteration. It must be admitted, too, that it is not exclusively the fault of the learned Barons, although it is more manifest in the Exchequer than in the other Courts. It has been for many years a growing practice everywhere. Perhaps Counsel were at first to blame, by boring the Judges with long and irrelevant speeches that touched on every topic—but the point in issue. We can make very great allowance indeed for the impatience of a Judge condemned to hear a man talk for an hour beside the question, and occasional hints to bring him back to the point will, in such case, be commendable. But the interruptions complained of are not confined to such cases, nor to such men. The best as well as the worst are troubled by them.

Indeed, the interrogatory system, to which all the judges are so partial, is a bad one, and should be resorted to only as a matter of necessity. It was said of Sir WILLIAM FOLLETT, that very early in his career he thus appropriately answered a Judge who had interrupted his argument with "But how, Mr. FOLLETT, if the plaintiff had re-entered?" "My lord, when that point arises, I shall be happy to argue it before your lordships; at present my case is that he did not, and to that I confine myself."

There is in this reply so much good sense, that we leave it to the consideration of the learned Judges, confident that it will carry with it the weight due to such an authority.

For ourselves it is, perhaps, scarcely needful to add that we have written with the most entire respect, assured that the custom complained of continues only because its effect is not apparent to the learned Barons themselves, and nobody has yet had the courage to tell them of it; and, above all, giving them full credit for the best motives, and that it proceeds from a desire to expedite the administration of justice by keeping Counsel to the point. But, practically, its effect is just the reverse of this; it protracts discussion, and certainly introduces perplexity, first in the Counsel, and afterwards in themselves.

RAILWAY LITIGATION.

THE decision of the Court of Exchequer in the case of Henry v. Goldney, 7 Law T. 211, where forty separate actions were commenced against so many members of a committee for the same debt, that the action pending against one might not be pleaded in bar of the actions against the rest, is, it must be admitted, directly opposed to the prevailing opinion of the Profession, and therefore the point will probably be raised again in some other court.

But in the meanwhile the decision seems to have been looked upon as a sort of justification of such a system of wholesale litigation, and we understand that many similar proceedings have since been taken.

Our purpose, in these few remarks, is to warn the readers of the LAW TIMES against the danger of such a course, and to shew them the real nature of the decision.

The single question here raised was as to the validity of the plea of lis pendens. Even if the Court was right in disallowing such a plea, the difficulties and dangers of a plaintiff remain as before.

Now, what are they?

The case of Carne v. Legh, 6 B. & C. 124, shews that the defendants might make a summary application to the Court on payment of the debt and costs by one, and that the Court will thereupon stay proceedings without payment of costs, and make the plaintiffs pay the costs of the application.

But if the defendants are resolute, the result cannot be otherwise than still more ruinous to the plaintiff even than this.

Suppose him to have brought forty actions for the same debt. All proceed pari passu; all are set down for trial; they cannot all be heard at one and the same instant: one must precede the others; the instant there is judgment upon that one, all the rest may plead that judgment in bar of their actions, and that plea would be good quis darrien continuance.

What, now, is the condition of the unhappy plaintiff? He has one judgment; to that alone he can now look for payment of his debt; his remedy is gone against all the rest, and if he has made a bad shot, and brought down a poor bird, he loses the whole.

But if he be fortunate enough to recover his debt from that one, what is his position with respect to all the rest? Here are thirty-nine actions down for trial, in each one of which he is sure of a verdict against him, and payment of the defendant's costs. What can he do? There is no resource but to discontinue, and this he can only effect by payment of the costs up to the time of discontinuance, and they will be at least 6*l.* per action, besides his own costs.

Before any attorney advises his client thus to multiply actions for the sake of increasing his costs, let him think of the possible consequences to himself also.

His client can have no object in forty actions for the same debt, unless, as in some cases we have heard of, the client shares the profit of the attorney in the transaction.

But let this come before the Court, and he would be struck from the rolls without mercy.

And if it can be in any manner made to appear that it was for the costs, and not for the client, that the multiplied actions were brought, we believe the Court would inflict an exemplary punishment.

So much by way of warning to attorneys speculating in multiplied suits for the same debt. A word now of advice to attorneys for defendants in such suits.

Let your first endeavour be to ascertain who are the other defendants, and act in concert.

If the debt be really due, let it be raised by contribution, and reserved for the acquittance of the one against whom the first judgment may be had. Make no terms; listen to no compromises; compel the plaintiff to proceed or to discontinue. If he do not proceed, he cannot obtain his debt; if he proceed, he can only obtain one judgment in his favour by subjecting himself to the costs in all the other actions. Any way you must catch him in his own trap, if you can only persuade your clients not to be terrified into compliance with an extortion by the sight of a writ.

And if you can catch the attorney tripping, you will be conferring a favour on your Profession by doing your best to relieve it of one of a class who, during the last six months, have brought upon it more discredit than will be effaced in six years.

LIABILITY OF PROVISIONAL COMMITTEES.

THE case of Law v. Wilson, reported and commented upon last week, and its apparent, perhaps real, discrepancy with some cases previously and since decided, shew how extremely vague is the information upon which both judges and juries are proceeding in the trial of the railway cases. It will not be labour ill-bestowed to endeavour to ascertain what are really the principles of law applicable to the questions already tried and still at issue, and what the actual state of facts; and as we are addressing Professional readers only, the argument shall be stated in as close and naked a form as language will permit. To prevent mistakes, it will be necessary to go back to its very foundations.

A orders certain goods of B, who supplies them. The law presumes a contract between A and B; by B to supply them, and by A to pay for them their fair value. If B deliver the goods, and A does not pay for them, B has an action against A for their value.

But if A had ordered the goods as agent for C and D, B would have an action against them also. In such an action it would be necessary for B to prove that A was the agent of C and D, authorized by them to contract the debt on their behalf.

An authority from C and D to A to contract debts for them, as their agent, may be either express or implied. For our present purpose we deal with an implied authority only; and we confine our view to the case of a servant.

A servant has an implied authority to make contracts for his master, within the ordinary and reasonable scope of his employment; at least, so far as the interests of third parties are concerned, and the master is bound by the contracts so made.

We have arrived now at the first point in the cases under discussion, up to which both the law and the facts are clear and indisputable. The contracts of the secretary for all matters reasonably requisite for the carrying out of a railway company are binding upon his employers.

Here, then, arises the great question—who are his employers?

But before we examine this, a hint may not be unwelcome. It often happened that no orders were given but by a vote of the Managing Committee, formally entered, and of which the creditor had notice. In such case, there can be no doubt that the Managing Committee are liable.

Where there was no Managing Committee, but only one general Provisional Committee, by whom all the business was transacted, there can be little, if any, doubt that all the members are liable, whether they actually interfered or not. They might have taken part, had they pleased; and, as their names appeared, it may be assumed that the credit was given to them.

But the question becomes vastly more complicated and difficult when there is a Managing Committee as well as a Provisional Committee.

Still it is not at all a question of law, but of fact. The law is clear enough, that the principal is liable for the acts of his agent; the point here at issue is, simply, who was the principal?

In fact, then, railways were conducted after a twofold fashion. In some instances, but few, the Provisional Committee appointed a Managing Committee. In the great majority of cases it will be found that the Managing Committee were self-appointed; that the Provisional Committee were merely asked to lend their names, as it were, as approvers, or patrons of the scheme, and not as managers; that as such, and only as such, they were lent; that the Managing Committee never invited the attendance, or permitted the interference, or asked the counsel of the Provisional Committee, or in any manner recognized them as having an interest, until they wanted their money to pay the debts they had wantonly incurred.

In such a state of facts there can be no rational doubt that the Managing Committee alone are answerable for the debts they alone incurred. The Secretary, who gave the orders, was appointed by them, was their servant and agent, and acted on their authority alone.

What, then, is the question for the jury?

The facts are few and simple. A, B, and C, are managers of a scheme. X, Y, and Z, consent to have their names placed in a list of Provisional Committee, but they take no part, are not permitted to interfere in the management, do not authorize any contracts, or appoint or control the managers who do.

From this the jury have to draw the inference as reasonable men.

Did X, Y, and Z, intend thereby to authorize A, B, and C, to make contracts for them to any amount they pleased? As Mr. Baron PARKE well put it, they cannot reasonably be considered to have done so. The Act of itself does not justify such a construction; it is entirely a question of intent.

But, we ask, if the presumption be not quite the other way? When there is a Managing Committee, every body knows what it means, as distinguished from the Provisional Committee; and may not an authority given to add the name to the latter, be deemed the best evidence that the defendant did not desire or intend to take upon himself the duties or responsibilities of the former?

In this view of the case, Mr. Baron PARKE was wrong when he directed the jury, that an authority to put down the name as "director" was not an authority to do so as a Provisional Committee-man. The fact is, that all are, nominally, directors, only these are subdivided into Managing Committee and Provisional Committee, and an authority to put down the name as director was an authority to place him on either list. But this is only one of the strange multitude of mistakes, both of fact and law that have been made by the Courts, and echoed by the press, from the very beginning of these saturnalia of litigation.

Nor will juries do other than further the ends of justice by so construing the facts we have described. Manifestly, justice prescribes that they who improvidently incurred the debts should pay them, and that they should not be permitted to throw them upon those whom they did not consult in the contracting of them. The creditor will equally recover, but he will do so from the party liable both in law and justice, instead of from the party liable, if at all, only in law and not in justice. E. W. C.

JOURNAL OF PROPERTY.

A PRACTICAL COMMENTARY ON

By WILLIAM HUGHES, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

4. How the various documents should be set out.

The vendor's solicitor must be especially careful to set out every document in the abstract that can in any way affect the title; as he will render himself personally liable for the consequences, if he suppresses any incumbrances, or keeps back any document whatever by which the real and true nature of the title may be revealed. (Arnot v. Biscoe, 1 Ves. sen. 96; Burroughs v. Lock, 10 Ves. 475; Boules v. Stewart, 1 Sch. & Lef. 227; 1 Prest. Abs. 39.)

Arrangement of the clauses.—In order that the various clauses may the more readily catch the reader's eye, it has long been the practice to distinguish the different parts of the abstracted documents by setting them out in margins, varying from one another in breadth; hence an ordinary abstract has commonly four or five marginal spaces. In the outer space, or margin, merely the date of the instrument is inserted. In the first inner space, or margin, if the documents are deeds, the title of them, as "Indentures of Lease and Release," with the names and additions of the conveying parties, are set out; the recitals are commonly set out in the second; the testatum in the first; the granting part in the second; the parcels in the fourth; the general words in the fifth; the habendum in the second; the declaration of uses in the third; the powers, if any, in the second, as also the covenants; and the clause noticing the attestation and endorsement of receipt of the purchase-money in the fourth. There is not, however, any precise rule laid down as to the manner in which the respective clauses are to be set out. The chief object of the arrangement is to enable the reader, at a single glance, to discover any particular portion of an abstracted document; a method which very considerably assists the investigation of a lengthy abstract, where it so frequently becomes necessary to refer backwards and forwards from one part of it to another.

As to Wills.—Wills are commonly set out within the inner or first margin; but with all due deference to those experienced practitioners who have so long adhered to this plan, I think it would be a far better one to confine it, at any rate, within the limits of the second margin. Few instruments call for more frequent or lengthy marginal remarks from the peruser of an abstract than a will, on account of the various objects it embraces, and not unfrequently from the inartificial manner in which it is penned; so that it often happens that these observations are too voluminous to be contained in the remaining margin, and are, consequently, obliged to be extended to the back of the sheet or carried on to the margin of the next. If possible, the marginal remarks of the party perusing the abstract should be placed as nearly as possible to the particular clause to which they refer.

Acts of Parliament—Fines and Recoveries.—

Acts of Parliament, as also chirographs of fines and exemplifications of recoveries, are usually set out within the first margin; as are also most matters of fact which in any way concern the title, such as marriages, births, deaths, descents, intestacies, failure of issue, or the like.

Order in which documents should be abstracted.—The various documents, as also such matters of fact as are important to the title, should be abstracted according to the order of their respective dates. If there are two documents of the same date, they should then be abstracted according to the order in which they may be presumed to have been executed; as for example: if lands were conveyed to trustees by one deed, upon trusts declared by another deed of the same date, the deed of conveyance to the trustees is the instrument which should be first abstracted.

5. Deeds, how to be abstracted.

As to the date and parties.—In abstracting a deed, the date and name of the deed are first set out; next come the names of the parties; who should be described, by their Christian and surnames, with the addition of esquire, gentleman, yeoman, &c. as the case may be, to which is frequently added their place of residence; and if they are described in the deed as filling any particular character, as heir, executor, trustee, &c. they should be so described in the abstract. This, indeed, is sometimes done where the parties act in either of the above mentioned characters, but are not so described in the deed; but whenever the latter is done, the additional description should be inserted within brackets, in order to shew that they were not so described in the abstracted deed.

Although it is not often done, I consider that in preparing the abstract the stamps of the abstracted deeds should be mentioned underneath the date, in order that the purchaser's solicitor may at once ascertain whether the duty affixed be correct or not. This often becomes a matter of high importance, and yet it is one that the attention of counsel is rarely drawn to, in investigating a title. It is one, however, to which I shall beg to draw the attention of my readers when I come to treat of that part of my subject.

Recitals.—After the description of the parties come the recitals, which should be set out in the order in which they occur in the abstracting deed, which, though they may often be considerably abbreviated, should yet be set out with sufficient fulness to explain their whole purport; but when once fully given, it will be sufficient, whenever it again becomes necessary to notice such recital, to state simply the name and date of the recited instrument (e.g.) "Reciting before abstracted indres. of le. & rele. of the 20th and 21st days of October, 1803." Where brevity in an abstract is desirable, several recitals may be noticed very shortly; as, "Reciting before abstracted indres. of le. & rele. of 20th and 21st days of October, 1803. Also reciting the before abstracted indres. of demise of the 1st day of Dec. 1804; the indres. of appointment of the 29th day of June, 1805; the indres. of le. & rele. of the 28th and 29th days of Sept. 1814; the indres. of bargain and sale of the 1st day of July, 1817; and the indres. of le. and rele. of the 11th and 12th days of Oct. 1823;" to the effect hereinbefore abstracted.

Testatum.—The testatum or witnessing part should set forth the nature of the consideration, and where money is required to be paid in any particular manner in pursuance of the terms of any trust or power, then that part of the deed which points out such particular mode of application should be fully abstracted, in order to shew that all the necessary requisites have been complied with. (1 Prest. Abs. 78.) Where there is a mere nominal consideration, as 5s. or a pepper corn, it should be shortly stated.

Granting clause.—The granting clause should contain all the words of conveyance, but the words of conveyance should not be repeated. If there are distinct granting clauses, each clause should be abstracted according to its order in the deed. (1 Prest. Abs. 75.) If the conveyance is made at the request or by the direction of any particular person, or where a party is stated to have conveyed in any particular character, as heir, executor, trustee, &c. it should be so stated. So where a power is exercised, the reference to the power should be inserted, together with the prescribed mode in which it was to be executed and attested; and it should also be stated in the attestation clause that all the above requisitions were duly complied with. (Ib. id.)

from the first abstracted deed, but in those subsequently abstracted it will be sufficient to refer to them as "All before abstracted premises." (1 Prest. Abs. 81, 83.) Unless where the description has been varied by more recent assurances, in which case such variation should be noticed. (Ib. 84.) If there is any exception reserved by the abstracted deed it should be set out verbatim in the same margin, and immediately following the parcels. The general words, such as "Together with all houses, &c." are usually inserted thus shortly; as are also the reversion, the all estate, and all deeds, &c. clauses, viz.:—"And the reversion, &c. and all the estate, &c. together with all deeds, &c." But should either of such clauses contain any special matter, it should be fully set out.

Habendum.—The latter words of the habendum as "To hold, &c." only are inserted; but the words of limitation following should be fully stated; as "To hold unto the said A B and his heirs, to the use of the said A B, his heirs, and assigns, for ever;" or "To hold unto and to the use of the said A B, his heirs, and assigns, for ever;" for whatever words of limitation are here used, they should be copied verbatim, and not simply their effect and operation inserted: as to A B in fee, to the usual uses to bar dower. The latter terms in fact, even in a recital, are incorrect; because there are many minute forms to use to bar dower, each varying from the other in some essential particular. As for example, the mode of executing the power of appointment reserved to the purchaser; which is sometimes directed to be attested by a certain number of witnesses; sometimes to be executed by any deed or instrument in writing; sometimes the power to appoint by will is omitted, and sometimes it is confined to a deed only; but without prescribing any number of witnesses; so that under such general terms as those above alluded to, it would be impossible for any one to know precisely what the exact uses were. This indeed might in some cases become very important to a title; as where the party conveys by appointment only, and the deed is attested but by one witness, when the power he purposes to exercise directs that there shall be two.

Where there are several habendum clauses.—If, as frequently happens, there are several habendum clauses, then each of these according to the respective order in which it stands in the deed must be set out in the abstract.

Of the reddendum clause.—Where there is a reddendum clause in the deed it may generally be given shortly; unless the render is made payable in any particular or unusual manner; but where that occurs, the manner in which it is payable should be stated. (1 Prest. Abs. 101.)

Declaration of uses, trusts, powers, and other special matters.—It requires considerable skill and judgment to abstract any special limitations in a proper manner, so as to avoid on the one hand overloading the abstract with unnecessary verbosity, as on the other to omit nothing necessary to the elucidation of the title. In the instance of estates tail, for example, the precise words of limitation creating the first estate tail; as also of any estate tail upon the barring of which the title depends should be fully set out; but the remainders, if created by the usual and proper words of limitation, may be simply stated to be such. In cases where the regular words of limitation have not been used, or an estate only arises by implication, although no doubt exists as to the legal effect and operation, the precise words used should, nevertheless, be copied verbatim into the abstract; as should also all provisions for abridging or defeating any estate. So where there is a proviso for redemption in a mortgage deed, the time and place of payment should be stated (if place be mentioned) as also by whom the money is to be paid, and the amount of interest reserved. Whether trusts or powers should be abstracted shortly or fully, will, in a great measure, depend upon whether or not such trusts have arisen, or such powers have been, or are intended to be, exercised. If powers have not been exercised, or are barred, released, or extinguished, or have become incapable of taking effect, or are in their nature immaterial to the title, it will be sufficient, in either of those cases, simply to refer to them. (1 Prest. Abs. 151.) Where trusts or powers of sale have been executed, the clauses (provided there be such) exonerating the purchaser from seeing to the application of his purchase-money, or inquiring into the necessity or expediency of the sale, or the performance of act or condition precedent or concurrent with the sale, should be abstracted rather fully. (Ib. id.)

Covenants.—The common covenants in deeds are usually abstracted shortly, as follows.—Covenants from said (venditor) that he was seised in fee; had good right to convey; for quiet enjoyment; free from incumbrances; and for further assurance. (Prest. Abs. 152; 3 ib. 56.) If there are any other covenants, particularly if they are of a special nature, they should be more fully abstracted. This should more particularly be done in the case of a sale of leasehold property; where all burdensome covenants should be set out in the abstract nearly verbatim; or at any rate quite sufficient should be extracted to explain their full meaning and object, so that a purchaser cannot possibly be misled by any omission in such abstract. Covenants from trustees are simply inserted as covenant from the said (trustee) that he has done no act to incur.

Execution and attestation clause.—It should be stated by what parties the deed is executed, and if any one or more named in the deed have omitted to do so, that fact should be mentioned. Omissions of this kind frequently occur where the dower trustee is described as a party to the conveyance, whose actual concurrence not being actually essential to pass the whole estate and interest intended to be thereby conveyed is often unattended to; but however immaterial his concurrence may be, the fact of his non-execution should nevertheless be noticed; for every fact connected with the title should be stated precisely as it occurs. Upon the same principle, therefore, if the instrument be executed in any particular manner, it should appear on the abstract that it has been executed accordingly. For example, where a power has been exercised in pursuance of some specific requisitions imposed by the instrument creating it, the particular mode of execution should be stated, in order to shew that the terms of the power have been strictly complied with. So where any act or thing is required to be done beyond the mere simple act of sealing and delivering the deed of conveyance; as livery of seisin upon a feoffment, or enrolment upon a deed of bargain and sale, or a disentailing deed; or where the acknowledgment of a married woman is necessary to give validity to the conveyance; such of those facts as have taken place should be mentioned. Nor indeed will simply doing this, in all instances, suffice; as in some at least the time also at which such acts were performed should also be set forth; and if the lands lie in a register county, and the deeds or other assurances have been duly registered, it should be so stated. In the instance of a feoffment also, the manner in which livery was given or received; as by attorney, or with the consent of the tenants, where the lands are on lease, as the case may be, is usually indorsed on the deed; and if this be done, it should so appear in the abstract. And in this, and in fact in all cases where a deed is executed by attorney, it will not be sufficient simply to mention that fact, but the power of attorney itself should also be abstracted, though this may be done very briefly.

Memorandum of receipt of purchase-money.—To the attestation there should be annexed a memorandum that the receipt of the consideration money is indorsed, and if signed and witnessed, as the common practice now is in all modern deeds, those facts should be mentioned. (1 Prest. Abs. 72; Rountree v. Jacob, 2 Taunt. 141.)

THE VALUE OF LAND.—The great Willenhall estate, in Warwickshire, with a rental of 1,550l. a year, was sold by Mr. Robins, at the Auction Mart, on Tuesday, for 48,100 guineas. Lord Craven is the purchaser. Mr. Jones Loyd and Mr. Mellor (one of the tenants) were the highest of the unsuccessful competitors. This sum, it will be seen, is thirty-three-and-a-half years' purchase, and upon a rack rental.

SALE OF ADVOWNSONS.—Mr. Alderman Farebrother disposed of, by auction, at Garraway's, the following advowsons, severally situated in the counties of Essex, Kent, and Suffolk. The first was the right of presentation to the rectory of Great Tey, about eight miles from Colchester, value about 904l. per annum, including the right of presentation to the vicarage of Mount Tey, sold for 9,800l. The right of presentation to the rectory of Kinstone, near Canterbury, the rent-charge in lieu of tithes, amounted to about 500l., sold for 2,950l. The perpetual right of presentation to the united rectory of Flempton-cum-Hargrave, four miles from Bury St. Edmunds, annual value 605l. 13s. 4d. subject to deductions of about 126l., sold for 5,200l.

Equity Courts.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

Thursday, June 4.
NEWMAN v. RING.

Practice—Order nisi to dissolve the common injunction—Mode of shewing cause against, or making the order absolute—Hand motions—Drawing up order—Breach of common injunction—Notice of motion to commit—Injunction—Breach of injunction in the nature of a wrong.

An order nisi having been obtained for dissolving the common injunction, unless cause shewn on a day named, the plaintiff's junior counsel on that day handed in to the registrar a brief, undertaking to shew cause on a future day mentioned. Later in the day the defendant's counsel moved in court that the order nisi be confirmed, and endorsed his brief accordingly. The defendant having then proceeded with his action without making any inquiry at the registrar's office, and without having drawn up any order, was held on appeal, reversing the decision below, liable to be committed for breach of the injunction.

This was a motion by way of appeal from the decision of the Vice-Chancellor of England, who had refused a motion made by the plaintiff that the defendants might be committed for breach of the common injunction. The notice of motion on the appeal had been varied by asking that the defendants, of whom there were three, "or some or one of them," might be committed for breach, whereas, when the motion was before the Vice-Chancellor, the notice of motion was simply that the defendants might be committed. At that time only one of the defendants had been personally served with the notice, but on this motion all three had been served. The plaintiff is the lessee of the tolls of the Kentish Town and Holloway turnpike roads, of which road the defendants were three of the trustees; and the object of the suit was to set aside the contract, and to restrain the defendants from prosecuting an action at law they had commenced against the plaintiff for the rent of the tolls.

The bill was filed on the 30th of December, 1845, by Newman, the lessee of the tolls, and Parsons, his surety. The answer was filed on the 13th of January, 1846, and that answer having been on the 6th of February reported insufficient, the common injunction was on the same day obtained on a petition of course at the Rolls. The next day the order for the common injunction was served upon the defendants, and on the same day the further answer was filed, but too late to prevent the common injunction from issuing. On the 20th of February the defendants obtained an order nisi to dissolve the injunction, unless cause shewn on the 25th of February, and on the 21st of February the order nisi was served on the plaintiff. On the 25th of February Mr. Glasse, the plaintiff's junior counsel, handed in a brief to the registrar undertaking to shew cause against dissolving the injunction on the 11th of March, which was the next motion day. On the same day (the 25th of February) Mr. Bethell, the defendant's senior counsel, moved in court that the order nisi be made absolute, and indorsed his brief "Order nisi made absolute, unless cause shewn." The defendant's solicitor did not take the brief to the registrar's office; but on the 28th of February, considering the injunction to have been dissolved, delivered a declaration in the action at law, and proceeded to require the plaintiff in equity to plead at law. The plaintiffs then moved before the Vice-Chancellor, that the defendants should be committed for breach of the injunction; but it was argued on the part of the defendants—first, that the defendants had had no notice of the injunction; secondly, that upon Mr. Bethell's motion, on the 25th of February, the order nisi for dissolving the injunction had been made absolute, no cause having been shewn in open court; that the handing in a brief to the registrar was insufficient; thirdly, that the notice of motion for committing the defendants applied to all three, but only one of them had been served with notice of the motion. Upon the two last points the Vice-Chancellor refused the motion, with costs. From that decision the plaintiffs appealed.

Cooper and Glasse, for the appeal motion.—The practice of the Court is to hand in the undertaking to shew cause to the registrar, and not wait until the motion to make the rule absolute is made in open court. The practice is thus stated in 1 Smith's Chancery Practice (second edition), 616:—"The defendant, on filing his answer, may obtain upon petition, or motion as of course, an order nisi to dissolve the common injunction, which is drawn up on the terms that unless the plaintiff, his clerk in court having notice thereof, shall, on the day of shew unto the Court good cause to the contrary, the injunction shall be dissolved. The day named in the order is usually the next motion day." * * * "On the day named in the order, the defendant is at liberty to move, as of course, that the order nisi may be made absolute, which is ordered accordingly, and the injunction thereby dissolved, unless the plaintiff appears by counsel, and shews insufficiency or impertinence in the answer or cause, or undertakes to shew cause on the merits why the injunction should not be dissolved on the next motion day. The defendant should be particularly careful only to furnish his counsel with a half-guinea hand brief, to move to make the order nisi absolute, and by no means to give him a copy of the pleadings; as if cause is not shewn on the merits, the latter brief is rendered useless, and will be disallowed him in costs. The order absolute to dissolve an injunction does not require to be served. If the plaintiff undertakes to shew cause on the merits (which he does by instructing counsel by a hand motion, but no order is drawn up), he undertakes to do so on a fixed day, usually the next motion day, and then, but not before, each party is allowed to make "a brief of the pleadings." And in p. 621 of the same book, the practice, when the plaintiff intends to shew cause on the merits, is thus stated: "If the plaintiff intends to shew cause upon the merits, he instructs his counsel to appear on the day on which the defendant would otherwise be entitled to make the order absolute, and to undertake to shew cause on the merits at the next seal. This is a motion of course." This practice has been strictly followed by the plaintiff, and the defendant's solicitor ought to have inquired at the registrar's office before proceeding with the action. On the 25th of February, Mr. Glasse handed in to the registrar a brief, requiring time to shew cause, and an order was drawn appointing the 11th of March, the next seal day, for hearing the motion to dissolve the common injunction. In a later part of the day Mr. Bethell mentioned the motion to the Court, and indorsed his brief "Order made absolute unless cause shewn." The defendant's solicitor did not inquire whether cause had been shewn, and did not draw up the order absolute to dissolve, which could not have been done without an affidavit of the service of the order nisi. He, however, considered the injunction dissolved, and on the 26th served the declaration in the action against the plaintiffs. On the 2nd March the affidavit of service of the order nisi was filed, but no order to dissolve the injunction had been drawn up.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—No order could have been drawn up on Mr. Bethell's brief, which had been superseded by Mr. Glasse's undertaking.

Cooper read the affidavit filed by the defendant's solicitor. He should have applied to the registrar of the day.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—It must be the result of the mistake of the solicitor.

James Parker and Perry, for the defendants, contended that the plaintiff had waived the irregularity, if it was one, by moving on the merits before the Vice-Chancellor to extend the common injunction. Mills v. Cobby, 1 Merivale, 3. The plaintiff had now served all the defendants with notice of this motion, but when before the Vice-Chancellor, one of them only had been personally served; the motion, therefore, could not have succeeded before the Vice-Chancellor. Ellerton v. Thirk, 1 Jac. & Walk. 376. If the plaintiff had a right to move at all he should have come to the Court promptly. The order on plaintiff's undertaking was not drawn up for ten days; he did not serve till the 7th of March.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—That was in time for the 11th of March, the day named in the order.

Parker.—It was the duty of the plaintiff's counsel to have waited in Court until the defendant's counsel moved to make the order absolute, and then given the undertaking, or to communicate with the counsel on the other side.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I think the usual course is, that the undertaking is handed in, and then the other party should inquire at the registrar's office.

The Lord Chancellor having intimated an opinion that plaintiffs must succeed upon their appeal motion, it was arranged that the sum in question in the cause and the action should be brought into Court, and the whole question between the parties decided by this Court, upon the plaintiff's appeal motion for extending the common injunction.

Parker contended that the defendant ought not to pay the costs, at all events on the motion before the Vice-Chancellor, inasmuch as the notice of motion was wrong, one defendant only having been served.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The breach of an injunction is in the nature of a wrong which is joint and several. All wrongs are several. That ground will not save the defendants from costs.

Parker.—It is an indulgence to permit the undertaking to be delivered in, instead of waiting in court for the motion.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—It is stated by Mr. Smith to be the regular practice. That was in accordance with the indorsement on Mr. Bethell's brief, which was, "order absolute unless cause shewn."

Wakefield, amicus curia.—It has been the practice to hand in the undertakings for thirty-nine years to my knowledge.

Parker.—The plaintiffs do not move until they have pleaded at law, and thereby condoned the breach. They should have put themselves under the protection of the Court.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—There being no injunction, judgment must have been signed of course; it would have been difficult to have got protection in time.

Perry.—The error was unintentional; the practice as stated by Mr. Smith is not clear, as nothing is said of it in Daniel. The onus of searching does not lie on the defendants.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Mr. Smith states an exceedingly good reason for the practice, namely, that it should not be necessary to deliver full briefs in the first instance. The practice has now existed for nearly fifty years. It appears to me that the proceedings of the plaintiff were regular, and that the order of the Vice-Chancellor on the motion to commit the defendants for breach of the common injunction must be discharged. That order saddles the plaintiffs, which I am of opinion should not have been ordered. The plaintiffs ought not to have been required to pay the costs. The only effect of discharging the order of the Vice-Chancellor is to relieve them from payment of those costs which they ought not to have been required to pay. The order must direct the plaintiffs to pay into court the instalments of the rent as they become due.

VICE-CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND'S COURT.

Feb. 11 and 12.

Copyright—Injunction—Piracy—Acknowledgment of quotations.

The plaintiff, H. G. B., had become entitled to the entire copyright of "Illustrations of the Life of L. de M." The defendant, D. B., commenced a certain publication called "The European Library," the first volume whereof was intitled "A Life of L. de M." several passages of which were admitted by the defendant to have been copied from the "Illustrations." Held, that the defendant having, by so doing, materially lessened the price of the original work by knowingly taking a material valuable part of it, this was sufficient to constitute a piracy from the "Illustrations," notwithstanding the passages copied were stated to be quotations, and were not so many nor extensive as to make the work so pirated a substitution for the original one.

The plaintiff, Henry George Bohn, moved for an injunction to restrain the defendant from selling or disposing of any more copies of the first volume of "The European Library" with any passages, articles, or matters, copied or taken from a work intitled "Illustrations of the Life of Lorenzo de Medici."

The bill and the affidavits in support of it stated that the plaintiff, H. G. Bohn, by various transactions and dealings, became entitled to the entire copyright of the "Illustrations," and had a considerable number of copies of it on sale; that the defendant, Daniel Bogue, in the month of November, 1845, published, for the first time, the first volume of the said "European Library," intitled "A Life of Lorenzo de Medici." The bill set forth several passages contained in the first volume, admitted to have been copied from the "Illustrations," and a passage also from the preface alluded to in the judgment.

Bethell and Renshaw appeared on behalf of the motion.

Cases cited: Miller v. Taylor, 4 Burr. 2,303; Maxman v. Tegg, 2 Russ. 385; Bramwell v. Halcombe, 3 My. & Cr. 737; Campbell v. Scott, 11 Sim. 31; Sweet v. Maugham, id. 51; Lewis v. Fullerton, 2 Bea. 6; Sanders v. Smith, 3 My. & C. 711.

Stuart, Talford, and Craig, for the defendants, attempted to prove that only inconsiderable portions of the work had been copied, and that whatever extracts there might be, they were acknowledged to be quotations, and not original passages; and not, therefore, of such a character and description as to render the original work in the plaintiff's possession valueless. The cases referred to by the other side, were undoubted cases of piracy, and consisted of such as where either the quotations and extracts were either not acknowledged, or were so extensive as to displace the original publication.

Cases cited: Wilkin v. Aikin, 17 Ves. 422; Carey v. Kearley, 4 Esp. 168.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I think the case has been very well argued, and that every thing has been said in favour of the defendant, that is capable of being urged, and it is out of the defendant's own mouth that it must be decided; because, where a complaint is made before the Court, it must appear that the piracy has either been of what is called "a large part," or of a "material part." Now, then, as it regards this, let us see what the defendant, or rather, what Mr. Hazlitt has confessed in the advertisement of this very book. In the first place, the "Life of Lorenzo de Medici," was published by Mr. Roscoe; and it seems to have attracted a great deal of notice and criticism; and many attacks were made on the book, both at home and abroad. From such criticisms and attacks, Mr. Roscoe thought it right to vindicate himself by a publication of the "Illustrations." Now, Mr. Hazlitt says, "And I have acted upon the same principle, with reference to the Illustrations of the 'Life of Lorenzo de Medici,' published by Mr. Roscoe, in 1822. This volume, a thick quarto, appearing now in the form of rather a thin octavo, is occupied, almost exclusively, with long controversial dissertations in reply to Sismondi and others, which, leaving the matter just where it stood, are of no interest whatever to the general reader. Here and there an illustration really illustrative occurs, and of all such I have, to a greater or less extent, availed myself." So that Mr. Hazlitt first of all throws overboard the greater part of the work as utterly worthless, as of no use whatever to any one, and of no interest whatever, and then, feeling conscious of the value of what he intended to take; feeling, I say, that it might be beneficial for his purpose to take it, and at the same time running down the value of the thing as much as possible, he makes use of this language: "Here and there an illustration really illustrative occurs, and of all such I have availed myself." Shewing by this act that he conceived the thing valuable, and using words at the same time which tend to depreciate the substance of the theft. I must, therefore, take it upon his own words, that the extracts which he has thought proper to take are more or less the really material or valuable part of the "Illustrations." They are, however, taken, and are embodied in this new publication—this volume of the "European Cabinet Library," which contains the "Life of Lorenzo;" and it is a matter of observation certainly, that where the passages are taken, they are taken with reference to the very passage of the "Illustrations" whence they are taken. Now I can easily conceive that confession may at the time it is made be so far a proof of honesty; but such a confession, in my mind, does not, from the very nature of it, diminish the previous theft, provided a theft has been committed: it may, indeed, save some trouble in convicting the party, but it neither excuses nor justifies his conduct. I have therefore, upon the defendant's own shewing, a positive admission that he has deliberately taken the only material and valuable parts in the plaintiff's book of illustrations. Now, then, I cannot but myself think that where the defendant, by his own statement, has shewn that he considers them valuable, whatever a jury may possibly think to the contrary, it is enough for this Court to see that the party has adopted means to retain it, because he feels confident that when it was first taken it was valuable, and so may answer his purpose. This seems to me to be a very plain case. Now, as it respects the opinion given of Lord Ellenborough in Ronorth v. Wilkes in the first volume of Campbell's Nisi Prius Reports, his lordship must be taken to have used the word "substitute" with reference to the particular case before him; and it is perfectly clear to my mind that never can be the true criterion. I will, for example, take this case. We are all aware that there has been a very valuable Greek Lexicon published by Mr. Liddell and another friend of his at Oxford; now no person who published that Lexicon, omitting three or four words at the end of each letter of the alphabet, could have done that of which it might be said it was a substitute, for nobody would take it as a substitute. Can it, however, be doubted that it might have the effect of materially diminishing the price of the first book? For although no one would take it as a substitute, many persons might not care so much, and might be inclined to purchase it cheaply for what it really did contain, which might probably amount to more than ninety-nine hundredths of the whole, and yet it would in no manner be a substitute; and therefore the language is not generally correct so as to be applicable in every case. Now as to what was decided by Lord Ellenborough in the case of Maxman v. Tegg, 2 Russ. 385. There I happened to be one of the counsel for the defendant, and from the first to last I never had any doubt that we had really an untenable case; and observe, there was an order penned with great accuracy; but look at the last paragraph, and see the result of that case. The affair was compromised by the defendant paying a sum of money to the plaintiffs to induce them not to proceed, and they acted thus upon a knowledge of their own case, and so it was a case which in reality furnished, after all, very valuable observations; but as a case it amounted to nothing whatever, for it was all on one side. This case before me is, however, one free from difficulty; and I must say, with reference to some observations which were made yesterday on the subject of the work, it really does not appear to me that where there happens to have been slight departures in the language made by Mr. Hazlitt from the notes originally compiled by Mr. Roscoe, that any material alteration has been effected for the better; but it appears to me that the thing, if possible, has been rendered something worse; and therefore what I shall do will be to grant the injunction, because, from the defendant's own declaration, I think the case is plain that he has taken a materially valuable part of the plaintiff's work with a full knowledge of the fact. The plaintiff must, therefore, bring such an action as he may be advised, on the usual terms. The rest of the motion must stand over, both parties having liberty to apply. Supposing it to be necessary for the purpose of trying the action, which I direct as to what I believe to be made out clearly, namely, that the plaintiff had an equitable right to the copyright in question, I should give such a direction as will get rid of that difficulty, and enable the substance of the case itself to be brought before a jury. The Court always protects the equitable interest; and provided the equitable right to the copyright is complete, the Court will see that the real question shall be tried, although there may exist a defect in respect of the legal property.

ROLLS COURT.

HULME v. CHITTY.

Separation deed—Construction—Afterborn children—General words.

By a deed of separation it was agreed between husband and wife that they should live separate during their joint lives, and that the children should live with the wife; and the husband covenanted to pay to the trustees of the deed during his life an annual sum for the support of the wife and "the children," the whole to cease on the death of the wife and children in his lifetime. The savings in any one year, if not required in a subsequent year, were to be accumulated on the trusts of a policy effected on his life. It was then agreed that (there being then five children living) a certain proportion of the annuity should, on the death of the wife before the husband, be deducted "for each and every of the said five children" then dead, or who should die afterwards in his lifetime. The income of the money assured on the policy was to go to the wife for life for the same purposes as the annuity; and after the death of the survivor of the husband and wife, the principal was to be divided equally among "all and every such child or children of the husband on the body of the wife begotten as should" attain 21, &c. There was also a maintenance clause; and if all the children died before attaining 21, &c. then the fund was to go to the husband, his executors, &c.

Twelve years after the separation, the husband and wife were reconciled and lived together, and a sixth child was born.

Three only of the five children born at the date of the deed lived to attain 21; and on the death of the wife, who survived her husband, they or their representatives claimed to be entitled to the fund, to the exclusion of the sixth child, who had also attained 21; and it was held, that though the language of the deed was comprehensive enough to include the sixth child, yet as it was contrary to the whole scope of the deed and the declared intention of the parties to include him, he was not entitled to any share.

On the 4th of December, 1809, a deed of separation was executed between Joseph Chitty of the first part, Elizabeth Chitty, his wife, of the second part, and Henry Richmond and Charles Chitty of the third part, whereby, after reciting that the parties of the first and second parts had agreed to live separate for the remainder of their joint lives, Joseph Chitty covenanted with the trustees that Elizabeth Chitty should be at liberty to live apart from him without molestation, &c.; and that "all and every the children" of Elizabeth Chitty, lawfully begotten, should and might be and reside with her, and be wholly under her control, and that all property thereafter coming to her should be to her separate use. And he further covenanted that he would during his life pay the sum of 550*l.* to the trustees, to be applied by them in such manner as they should think fit, for the maintenance and support of Elizabeth Chitty and "of her said children," or such of them as should from time to time be living. And it was thereby also agreed, that if the trustees should not think fit to apply the whole of the said annual sum of 550*l.* in any one year for the purposes of the trust, the surplus should be accumulated and held by them upon the trusts thereafter expressed of and concerning the sum of 1,500*l.* the amount of a policy agreed to be effected on the life of Mr. Chitty, but with liberty to use the savings so effected on the same trusts in any subsequent year. And, after reciting that there were then five children living, it was thereby agreed that on the death of the said Elizabeth Chitty (in case the same should happen in the life time of the husband,) the sum of 75*l.* should be deducted from the said annual sum of 550*l.* "for each and every of the said five children of them, the said Joseph Chitty and Elizabeth Chitty, who should or might be dead" at the death of the said Elizabeth Chitty, with a like deduction for any one dying afterwards. And it was thereby declared that the trustees should invest the 1,500*l.* to be received upon the policy of assurance in the public funds, &c. and should pay the dividends and income thereof to Elizabeth Chitty for life; and after the death of the survivor of them, the said Joseph Chitty and Elizabeth Chitty, the principal should be in trust "for all and every such child or children of the said Joseph Chitty on the body of the said Elizabeth Chitty his wife lawfully begotten," who, being a son or sons, should attain twenty-one, or, &c. equally to be divided between them, share and share alike. It was also thereby provided that the trustees might apply the income of the expectant share "of every such child" towards his or her maintenance till the share of him or her became vested; and after the death of the husband and wife they were also to apply a portion, not exceeding a moiety of the share "of each or any such children," for his or her advancement in the world. And if no child should live to attain a vested interest, the trust fund was to be in trust for Joseph Chitty, his executors, administrators, or assigns.

At the date of the deed there were five children living, four of whom died in the lifetime of their father, two of them under age and without issue; but the other two lived to attain twenty-one. Elizabeth Chitty, the remaining child of the five then living, in the year 1824 intermarried with J. W. Hulme, and has attained twenty-one.

In the year 1814 Mr. and Mrs. Chitty became reconciled, and lived together from that time till the death of Mr. Chitty in 1841; and on the 12th of September, 1815, Mr. Tompson Chitty, a sixth child, was born. On the 17th of February, 1841, Mr. Chitty died intestate; and Elizabeth Chitty, his widow, died on the 5th of January. The trust fund arising from the policy, which was effected in the Equitable Assurance Society, together with the savings effected, amounted to nearly 10,000*l.* and Tompson Chitty claiming a share therein, Mr. and Mrs. Hulme, their four infant children, and the trustees of their marriage settlement, instituted this suit to try the question.

Kindersley (with him Willcock), for the plaintiff, said there was no dispute about the facts, and the only question was how far the trusts included the after-born son. The whole scope and object of the deed, as well as the declared intention of the parties, are in favour of the construction contended for by the plaintiffs. The words "the children," &c. indeed might be large enough to comprehend an after-born child, but they must be modified and explained by the circumstances.

Turner (with him H. Stensens), for the widow and infant child of one of the three children who attained twenty-one, and for the widow of the other and her husband.

Robson, for an incumbrancer on the share of one of the children.

Roupeil (with him James), for Tompson Chitty.—The deed was intended to serve two purposes; the first and primary being the separation, and to make provision for the wife and children in consequence thereof; and the other was a trust to provide for the wife and children after the death of Mr. Chitty. Whether intended or not, the wording of the deed is such as to embrace the existing state of things; and the trusts are not exhausted, even if Mr. Chitty and all the children were to die.

Kindersley in reply.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said there could be no doubt whatever the intention of the parties was to live separate during the rest of their lives, not that the covenant was in the least obligatory upon them, for if they chose to enter again upon the discharge of their conjugal duties, no deed could prevent them from doing so. It is out of the question therefore to suppose they had any intention of coming together again. That agreement then being intended to be carried into effect, and being recited in the deed, covenants for that purpose were entered into by Mr. Chitty. The parties appear to have proposed to themselves two distinct objects; first, to provide during the life of Mr. Chitty for the maintenance and support of the wife and also of the children, or such of them as should from time to time be living; and that was secured by the payment of the annual sum of 550l. to the trustees for that purpose. Now when the parties had thus entered into an agreement by which they had manifested their intention that there should be no communication between them, can there be a doubt that they meant any other children than those then living, or such of them as should be living from time to time? The next object which is distinctly stated, is to make such further provision for the wife and children as thereafter mentioned. How is that done? It was agreed that the savings out of the annual sum of 550l. not required in subsequent years, should be accumulated, and should be held and applied on the same trusts as the 1,500l. intended to be secured by the policy to be effected on the life of Mr. Chitty; that is, that in case Mr. Chitty should die first, the income was to be paid to Mrs. Chitty, for the support of herself and children. All this appears to be so clearly and plainly set forth in the deed, that there could be no doubt about it. If the matter rested there; but a question has been raised as to the provision disposing of the trust fund after the death of the survivor of Mr. and Mrs. Chitty, and it is argued that it was to be held for all and every the children of Mr. and Mrs. Chitty. The trust is, "after the decease of the survivor of them, the said Joseph Chitty and Elizabeth Chitty, in trust for all and," &c. Now, if you consider the whole object of the deed, founded upon the agreement to live separate for their joint lives, even if there was more ambiguity in the clause than there is, I think it clear that the only objects of the deed intended to be provided for, are the wife and children then living. There is nothing to shew that Tompson Chitty was not as much an object of his father's affection as his other children; but what has happened makes a difficulty in his case; and the Court would be glad to be able to include him as well as the other children in the provision made for them; but it cannot do so contrary to the plain meaning and intention of the deed executed by the parties themselves. Mr. and Mrs. Chitty having lived separate for twelve years, became reconciled, and, contrary to the intention of the deed, but in accordance with their religious and moral duties, and their solemn engagements to one another, came together again, and lived together for twenty-seven years; and the consequence was the birth of Mr. Tompson Chitty; and the contest now is, that he being a child of Mr. and Mrs. Chitty, lawfully begotten, is entitled to a share of a provision made for children by the deed. I should be glad if I could construe the deed so as to admit him, but it is impossible for me to do so. The language employed, if taken by itself, and not in relation to the scope and object of the deed, would include him, that is, the words might have that effect, if they only were to be looked to. It is said there were two objects of the deed; first, to provide for the wife and children during Mr. Chitty's life, and then to create a trust for the wife and all the children, after the death of the survivor; but the circumstances of the case do not admit of that construction. The deed does not forbid future cohabitation; but it prevents me from saying that at the time it was executed the parties intended to make a provision for children other than those then living. They intended a permanent separation, which was perfectly inconsistent with the notion that they were making a provision for children born after reconciliation. On the whole, I am bound to declare that the provision was intended for the wife and children then living. Mr. Tompson Chitty is entitled to his costs.

VICE-CHANCELLOR KNIGHT BRUCE'S COURT.

Tuesday, May 5.

WOOD v. HARDISTY.

Trustee—Breach of trust—Specialty debt.

Where by a deed, to which A B was a party, it was declared that A B, his executors, administrators, and assigns, should stand possessed of certain funds in trust for C D (also a party to the deed), her executors, administrators, and assigns, and A B died insolvent, it was held that C D's representative was entitled, in respect of the money due under the deed, to claim as a specialty creditor against the estate of A B, notwithstanding circumstances which were alleged to have altered the position of the claim.

By an indenture, dated the 16th of May, 1838, and made between the Rev. Friskney Gunniss, of the first part, William Forbes, of the second part, and Susanna Gunniss, the sister of F. Gunniss, of the third part, three policies of assurance on the life of the said F. Gunniss, were assigned by him to W. Forbes, his executors, administrators, and assigns, subject to any mortgages affecting the same, upon trust that Forbes, his executors, administrators, or assigns, should receive the moneys payable on account of the policies, and out of the same pay all mortgages and charges affecting the same, and interest thereon, and all costs in executing the trusts; the indenture then proceeded as follows: "And it is hereby further declared, that, subject to the trusts aforesaid, the said W. Forbes, his executors, administrators, and assigns, shall stand possessed of the said policies of assurance, and of the moneys, bonuses, and accumulations, to be received in respect thereof, and of all other the premises hereby assigned, or intended so to be, upon trust for the said Susanna Gunniss, her executors, administrators, and assigns, for her and their own absolute use and benefit." F. Gunniss, by his will, dated the 26th of July, 1838, appointed the said W. Forbes and Susanna Gunniss executor and executrix thereof, and gave all his real and personal estate unto or in trust for Susanna Gunniss. F. Gunniss died on the 9th of November, 1838, and his will was proved on the 17th of the same month by Forbes and Susanna Gunniss, but it was alleged by the bill that Forbes alone acted in winding up the testator's estate. Shortly after the death of F. Gunniss, Forbes received the moneys payable in respect of the three policies, and, after discharging the incumbrances, the same amounted to 6,812l. 18s. Forbes received other moneys, part of the testator's estate, and by a written account of his receipts and payments, dated the 18th of October, 1839, there appeared to be a balance due to S. Gunniss from Forbes, of 7,000l. This account, with an acknowledgment that that sum, with interest at 4 per cent. from the 10th of October 1839, was due to Miss Gunniss, was signed by her and by Forbes. Forbes died on the 6th of January 1842, in testate, and the defendants, his nieces, took out letters of administration of his effects on the 3rd of February following. By payments made to Miss Gunniss by Forbes, and by the defendants, the sum due to Miss Gunniss was reduced to 2,400l. S. Gunniss, by her will, appointed the plaintiff and another person, who renounced probate, her executors, and died on the 30th of January 1844. The will was proved on the 4th of May 1844. Forbes's estate proving insufficient for the payment of all his debts, the question discussed was as to the right of the plaintiff to be considered a specialty creditor for the moneys due to him as the representative of Miss Gunniss.

Swanston, Russell, and W. R. Ellis, for the plaintiff, contended, that there being an agreement under seal in this case, that the trustee will hold the moneys in trust for Miss Gunniss, such agreement was in the nature of a covenant, and, therefore, there was a debt to Miss Gunniss in the nature of a specialty debt.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Then every trustee under a marriage settlement, who commits a breach of trust, is a specialty debtor.

Swanston.—A mere breach of trust is only a simple contract debt, but if there are other circumstances, the fact of the debt arising from a breach of trust would not prevent its being a specialty debt. In Lord Montford v. Lord Cadogan (19 Ves. 638), Lord Eldon remarked, "It is said that trustees are not under covenant, and they are not bound under hand and seal; but they have, in equity, undertaken to execute the trusts exactly as if they had so executed the instrument; and the general words, 'it is declared and agreed,' &c. amount to a covenant."

Headfield, for the defendants. The following cases were also cited:—Deg v. Deg (2 P. Wms. 412); Turner v. Wardle (7 Sim. 80; Vin. Abr. Cov. 387, pl. 7); Vernon v. Vaudry (2 Atk. 119); Coz v. Bateman (2 Ves. sen. 19); Gifford v. Manley (Ca. temp. Talb. 109); Mason v. Davenport (2 Sim. 227); Clayton's case (1 Mer. 572); Perris v. Roberts (1 Vern. 34); Sterndale v. Hankinson (1 Sim. 393); Williams v. Randburn (6 Bing. 71); Whittington v. Jennings (6 Sim. 493); Randall v. Lynch (13 East, 179); The Duke of St. Albans v. Ellis (16 East, 352); and Bartlett v. Hodgson (1 Term Rep. 42).

The VICE-CHANCELLOR considered that the debt must be treated as a specialty debt, and referred it to the Master to inquire whether any thing, and what, was due from the estate of Forbes, deceased, to the plaintiff, as executor of Miss Gunniss, under the indenture of the 16th of May 1838, with liberty to state special circumstances, and reserving further directions and costs.

Friday, May 29.

HALL v. AUSTIN.

Practice—Parties—32nd Order of August 1841. Where three persons commit a breach of trust, and one dies, a person complaining of the breach of trust may, under the 32nd Order of August 1841, sue the survivors without making the representatives of the deceased trustee parties.

Where executors commit a breach of trust, and one dies before any suit is instituted to a suit for the general administration of the estate, the representatives of the deceased executor are properly parties.

Alexander Dizmore Keate, by his will dated the 30th of July, 1823, appointed R. Poole, Edward Austin, and Barbara Keate, his executors. The testator died in 1826, and his will was proved by all the executors. R. Poole died in 1832. This suit was instituted against Edward Austin and Barbara Keate, for the purpose of administering the testator's estate, and it was also sought by the suit to charge the defendants with 500l. alleged to have been paid by them in breach of trust. By his answer it was averred by Austin that R. Poole concurred in the alleged breach of trust, and that his representatives were proper parties to the suit.

Roll, for the defendant, Austin, upon the question of parties, cited Perry v. Knott, 5 Bea. 293; Kellaway v. Johnson, 319; Biggs v. Penn, 4 Hare, 469; Shipton v. Rawlins (before Vice-Chancellor Wigram); Lloyd v. Smith, 7 Jurist; and Allan v. Houlden, 6 Bea. 148. The 32nd Order of August 1841 provided that, in all cases in which the plaintiff had a joint and several demand against several persons, either as principals or sureties, it should not be necessary to bring before the Court, as parties to a suit concerning such demand, all the persons liable thereto; but the plaintiff might proceed against one or more of the persons severally liable. This Order was not applicable to such a case as the present, as there was no contract in the case of a breach of trust. The order might be applied where the liability was by contract, and also where the Court sees distinctly that the contest is between the plaintiffs and the persons primarily liable, and then the plaintiffs would be the only persons to suffer by the absence of the other parties.

Russell and Prior, for the plaintiff, relied upon the decisions by the Master of the Rolls upon the 32nd Order.

Roll, in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The Master of the Rolls is one of the judges who signed the orders in question, and he is the senior of the judges whose opinions on this order, whether conflicting or not conflicting, have been brought under my attention; and therefore, without attempting to form any opinion of my own, I shall follow the Master of the Rolls, unless a judge senior to him (that is, the Lord Chancellor) appears to have decided otherwise; and then I shall, also without forming any opinion of my own, follow his decision. I understand the Master of the Rolls to have decided that this order does apply to a breach of trust; and that if three men commit a breach of trust, a person complaining of that breach of trust, may sue two, and not the third. That, however, does not dispose of this case. It is suggested that if executors commit a breach of trust, and one of them dies before any suit is instituted, the persons interested in the estate cannot institute a suit for the general administration of the estate without making the representatives of the deceased executor parties. Then, if that be so, this suit is defective for want of parties.

The question suggested was argued on a subsequent day, and

The VICE-CHANCELLOR considered that it would be proper to make the representatives of the deceased executor parties.

Will—Construction—Dower—Election.

When a testator devises his real and personal estate to trustees, and creates a beneficial trust in favour of his wife, and then directs his trustees to manage his estate in such a manner as is inconsistent with the setting out of dower by metes and bounds, the trust in favour of his wife will be sufficient to put her to her election.

Nicholas Lowes, by his will dated Oct. 29, 1838, devised and bequeathed all the real and personal estate unto and to the use of his brother John Lowes and George Lowes, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, according to the different nature and tenures thereof, upon trust to pay his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and subject thereto and to all such expenses as shall be incurred in the management of the said trusts, upon trust to raise out of the rents a yearly sum of 100l. and pay the same to his wife, Lucy Lowes, during her widowhood, and subject thereto to apply such part of the rent as may be necessary for the maintenance of his daughter, Mary Lowes, until she attain twenty-one years of age, and then to pay the whole of the said rents to his daughter for life for her separate use, remainder to the children of his said daughter, remainder over; and he directed his said trustees, during the continuance of the trusts, and notwithstanding any of the trusts therein contained, to continue and carry on all or any of the farms or other concerns in which he might be engaged at the time of his death, for such period, and in such manner as his said trustees should think fit, with full power to restrict or diminish, or to enlarge any such concern, as they should think proper; and he further empowered his said trustees, during the continuance of the trusts, to demise or lease all or any part of the hereditaments, for the time being, vested in them, upon the trusts aforesaid, for any term not exceeding twenty-one years, in possession or reversion; and he also gave his trustees power to sell or mortgage; and in case of sale, he directed the produce of his real estate to be held as personal estate, and subject to the trusts of his will, so far as the same were applicable, and appointed the plaintiffs his executors and trustees of his will, and died in the year 1841, leaving his wife and daughter surviving.

The testator's estate consisted of freehold and copyhold lands, some of which were out upon mortgage, and a great part of the remainder he held in his own hands, and farmed for his own purposes.

The personal estate proving insufficient to carry out the trusts of the will, the trustees determined to sell the lands; upon which the widow put in her claim for dower out of those lands, in addition to the annuity of 100*l.* given by the will; the trustees refused to admit her claim for dower, and filed the present bill on the 19th of May, 1842, against all parties beneficially interested under the will, to have the trusts administered under the decree of the Court; when the cause came on for further directions, the only important question argued before the Court was, whether the widow was not bound to make her election between the right to dower, and the annuity given to her by the testator?

Wood and Foster appeared for the plaintiffs, and contended that the powers given to the trustees over these lands were wholly inconsistent with the proceedings necessary in setting out dower by metes and bounds. The testator gave her an annuity which, with the dower, if allowed, would exhaust the whole produce of the estate. The testator must have known the value of his property when making his will, and it is clear he intended to provide for the maintenance of his daughter, which would wholly fail if the widow had both the annuity and the dower out of the estate. They cited Miall v. Brain, 4 Mad. 119; Butcher v. Kemp, 5 Mad. 61; Birmingham v. Kirwan, 2 Sch. & Lef. 444; Hull v. Hill, 1 Dru. & Wan. 94; Roodly v. Dixon, 3 Russ. 204; Strahan v. Sutton, 3 Ves. 349.

Romilly and Toller, for the defendants, contended that with regard to the claim of dower there was nothing in the will that shewed any intention in the testator to bar his widow of a claim for dower. He did not so express himself. The insufficiency of his estate is no ground for depriving her. He may have supposed it sufficient, and if he had intended the annuity to be a substitute for dower nothing could have been easier than for him to have declared himself so when he bequeathed the annuity, and cited Dowson v. Bell, 1 Keen, 761; Harrison v. Harrison, id. 765; Birmingham v. Kirwan, 2 Sch. & Lef. 444; Greatoris v. Casey, 6 Ves. 615.

Vice-Chancellor WIGRAM.—The point to be determined in this case is, whether the widow of the testator is entitled to her dower and freebench out of the lands left by the testator in addition to an annuity bequeathed to her in his will. It is clear a mere devise of lands to a wife for life, or an annuity, is not in itself sufficient to bar dower, which is a clear legal right, and intent to exclude that right by voluntary gift must be demonstrated either by express words or by clear and manifest intention. If there be anything ambiguous or doubtful, if the Court cannot say that it was clearly the intention to exclude, then the averment that the gift was made in lieu of dower cannot be supported, and to make a case of election, that is necessary, for a gift is to be taken as pure, until a condition appears; a widow's title to dower must in all cases be admitted, unless the will under which she takes the benefit contains provisions absolutely inconsistent with her claim of dower; the difficulty in all cases must be as to the application of these principles to particular cases; in the present case, had the will not proceeded (after making provision for his wife, and daughter, and his debts) to direct the carrying on of the farms in his occupation at his decease, in the same manner as in his lifetime, or as the trustees should think proper, I should have held the widow clearly entitled to dower, and her annuity also; but it has been held in Roodly v. Dixon that a direction to carry on farms in the occupation of a testator at the time of his death, and other duties which make the setting out of dower by metes and bounds, inconsistent with the complete performance of such trusts, imply an intention to exclude the right of dower, and put the widow to her election; therefore, in this case, if I was to decide that the widow should not be put to her election, I should be substantially overruling that case; and the case of Miall v. Brain, and the observations of Lord Redesdale upon the case of Villa Real v. Lord Galway, when he gave judgment in Birmingham v. Kirwan, and should make the law more difficult in its application than it is at present; I, therefore, decree that the widow is bound to elect.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Tuesday, May 26.

HARROLD v. WHITTAKER.

Covenant for rent—Assignee of mortgage—Pleading—Duplicitly.

Covenant for rent by assignee of mortgage against assignee of a term upon a lease, reserving rent to the mortgagee, during the continuance of the mortgage, and after payment and satisfaction thereof to the mortgagor. The covenant laid in the declaration was, that the lessee did covenant, &c. with the mortgagee, and also with the mortgagor, that he, his executors, &c. should and would pay, &c. to the mortgagor the yearly sum, &c. on the several days and times, and in manner as the same was thereinbefore reserved and made payable.

The declaration averred, that, after the making of the lease, and during the continuance of the term thereby granted, and after defendant became assignee, and while he continued assignee, and before the commencement of the suit, two years' rent became and was still in arrear and unpaid to the plaintiff; but it contained no direct averment that the mortgage was continuing when the rent accrued, or that the rent became in arrear after the plaintiff became assignee of the reversion.

The defendant pleaded, that before any part of the rent became due, and after the making of the lease, and during the continuance of the mortgage, the mortgagee was paid and satisfied of all the principal moneys and interest due to him by virtue of the mortgage out of moneys arising from the absolute sale of a part of the demised premises; and that the mortgagee afterwards, by indenture executed by him, acknowledged himself to be so paid and satisfied, and released the mortgagor from all claims in respect thereof.

Held, 1. That the plea sufficiently shewed that the mortgage was not continuing, inasmuch as the continuance of the mortgage in the reddendum meant the continuance of the mortgage debt. 2. That the plea was bad for duplicity: the payment in satisfaction and the release being too distinct grounds of defence. 3. That the action might be maintained by the mortgagee alone, as the interests of mortgagor and mortgagee in the covenant were separate. 4. That it was unnecessary to aver in the declaration the continuance of the mortgage term. 5. That it was unnecessary to aver in the declaration the continuance of the mortgage, meaning thereby the mortgage debt; that being a condition subsequent and not precedent to the right of the mortgagee to receive the rent. 6. That, upon general demurrer, the averment that the rent became due to the plaintiff was sufficient, without a direct averment that the rent became due after the plaintiff became assignee of the reversion.

Covenant for rent by assignee of mortgagee, demurrer to the plea. The material part of the pleadings, and the points raised in argument, are sufficiently set out in the judgment of the Court.

F. Robinson argued in support of the demurrer; and Peacock, contra.

Cur. adv. vult.

PATTESON, J.—This was an action of covenant for rent under a demise by indenture, by which James Eyre Salmon, being mortgagee of, amongst others, the premises for which the rent is now claimed, at the request of Benjamin Yeoman, the mortgagor, demised, and Yeoman also himself confirmed, to Robert Lee, whose assignee the defendant is, for 4,000 years, at the annual rent of eighteen guineas; the words of the reddendum are, "yielding and paying therefore yearly, and every year during the said term, to the said J. Eyre Salmon, his executors, administrators, and assigns, during the continuance of the said hereinafter recited mortgage, and after payment and satisfaction thereof, unto the said Benjamin Yeoman, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the yearly rent of eighteen guineas." The covenant on which the declaration is framed is in these words: "And the said Robert Lee did thereby covenant, promise, and agree, to and with the said J. Eyre Salmon, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and also to and with the said Benjamin Yeoman, his executors, administrators, and assigns, in manner following, that is to say—that he, the said Robert Lee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, should and would well and truly pay, or cause to be paid, to the said

Benjamin Yeoman, the yearly rent of eighteen guineas, free and clear of all deductions and charges, on the several days and times in the manner as the same was thereinbefore reserved and made payable." The interest of Yeoman, the mortgagor, appeared to be the term of 4,000 years, the whole of which he had assigned to Salmon, by way of mortgage, prior to the making of the lease to Lee. The plaintiff then transferred title to Salmon by deeds, so all of which Yeoman's name appeared as a party; but the declaration does not aver that any one of them was executed by Yeoman. This is material, because if the plaintiff had traced title both from Yeoman and Salmon, both from the mortgagor and the mortgagee, the question is that case might have assumed a very different shape; but from his tracing only from Salmon, the mortgagee, he undoubtedly puts himself in the situation of assignee of the mortgagee only. There is no averment in the declaration that the mortgage was continuing at the time when the rent sued for accrued. The declaration then alleges, that after the making of the indenture of lease, and during the term of 4,000 years—that is, the term granted by the lease to Lee—and after the defendant became assignee, and while he continued assignee, and before the commencement of this suit, two years' rent became and was still in arrear and unpaid to the plaintiff; but it does not aver in terms that it became in arrear after the plaintiff became assignee of the reversion. The defendant pleaded that before any part of the said arrears of rent became due, and after the making of the indenture of demise, and during the continuance of the mortgage, Salmon was paid and satisfied of all the principal moneys and interest due to him by virtue of the mortgage out of the moneys arising from the absolute sale of a part of the demised premises; and afterwards, by indenture executed by him, acknowledged himself to be so paid and satisfied, and acquitted, released, and discharged Yeoman from all claims in respect thereof. Several objections are taken to this plea: first, that it does not shew that the mortgage is not continuing, but only that the mortgage money had been paid. Now this objection depends on the meaning to be given to the words "during the continuance of the said mortgage, and after payment and satisfaction thereof," in the reddendum. These words plainly shew that the rent was to be paid to Yeoman, not on reassignment of the term, or putting an end to the mortgage security, but on the payment and satisfaction of the money secured by mortgage, and by the words "during the continuance of the mortgage," is plainly meant the continuance of the mortgage debt. Now the plea distinctly states payment in satisfaction of the mortgage money before the rent sued for accrued, which sufficiently shews that the rent was no longer payable to the mortgagee; in which case he certainly could not have sued alone, if at all. The second objection to the plea is, that it is double, and this seems to us to be fatal. The payment of the mortgage money and the execution of the deed by the mortgagee, releasing the mortgagor, are plainly two different things, and either would have been sufficient to shew that the mortgage no longer continued; that is, in the sense in which we speak of the mortgage, as the mortgage money. If the plaintiff, by his replication, were to deny the payment, he would leave the release unanswered, which would have put an end to the mortgage debt, even if it were not paid; and, on the other hand, if he denies the release, it leaves the payment of the money unanswered; and we think the defendant cannot sustain the plea against the charge of duplicity, which is one of the causes of demurrer set forth. But it is said the declaration is bad, and that it is so on several grounds. 1st. It is objected that the action should have been brought jointly by the mortgagee and the mortgagor. Now, the mortgagor having parted with all his legal interest, and having only the equity of redemption, nothing would pass from him to the lessee, and he would hardly be said to have confirmed the lease; then the reddendum makes the rent payable separately, at one time to the mortgagee, and at another time to the mortgagor; and the covenant is capable of being read as several. The Court, therefore, must construe the covenant according to the interest and according to the apparent meaning of the covenant itself; and this is in accordance with all the cases found collected in the note to Eccleston v. Cliphsham, 1 Saund. 153, the last edit.; added to this, there is the case of Bradburne v. Botfield, 14 Law Journal, N. S. Exch. 330. I do not know whether it is reported in any other book or not. (e) 2ndly. It is objected that the declaration ought to have averred the continuance of the mortgage. This objection arises on general demurrer; and there is an averment in the declaration that the plaintiff became, and was and is possessed of the entirety of the said demised premises, for all the residue and remainder of the said term of 4,000 years; that is the term, and which only Yeoman had. This is probably a sufficient averment by implication of the continuance of the mortgage term, if any such averment were necessary. See Fryer v. Coombes, 11 A. & E. 403, and the note to Thursby v. Plant, 1 Saund. 265, a; for, in truth, no avertment is necessary, as regards a term of years which is certain and definite. The objection, however, here is, that the continuance of the mortgage is not averred, by which we understand the continuance of the mortgage debt; however, if this had been a continuance of the term, it is not necessary to aver it, because the term of 200 years, or any other number of years, must continue to the end, unless put an end to by some power. The objection, however, here is, that the continuance of the mortgage is not averred, by which we can only understand the continuance of the mortgage debt. There is nothing in the declaration that supplies the want of this averment by implication, for the mortgage term may well continue after the mortgage money has been paid. The question, therefore, is, whether the payment of the mortgage-money, by which the continuance of the mortgage would be determined, is to be considered a condition subsequent and in discharge of the right of the mortgagee to redeem the rent within the late case, in the Court of Exchequer, of Brooke v. Spang, 15 Law J. N. S. 94, cited in the argument, and we think that it is to be so considered; that it is not necessary to hold that the continuance of the mortgage should be averred in the declaration, as it was a condition subsequent, and not precedent. The third objection was, that it does not appear by the declaration that the rent sued for accrued after the plaintiff became assignee of the reversion. Whatever force there might be in this objection pointed out on special demurrer, we are of opinion, on general demurrer, the averment that the rent became due to the plaintiff is sufficient. On the whole, therefore, we are of opinion, the judgment must be for the plaintiff.

(e) It is also reported 14 Mee. & W. 599.

Prescription—Interruption.

Where a claim to a right of common rests upon continued acts of enjoyment, sometimes resisted and sometimes acquiesced in, during thirty years, it is sometimes left to the jury to say whether the interruption was such a substantial enjoyment as to support a plea to have effect under 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 71.

Replevin for taking cattle on a common called Rudge Heath. The avowry alleged the locus in quo to be the soil and freehold of the defendant. The plea in bar set up a right of common claimed as of right under Prescription Act (2 & 3 Wm. 4, c. 71). At the trial it appeared that the locus in quo was a waste piece of ground belonging to a manor of which the defendant was the lord, but that for thirty years the plaintiff had constantly and openly sent his sheep upon it, claiming the right of pasture there. This was sometimes resisted and sometimes not, and the resistance had, at times, been unsuccessful. Platt, B. left it to the jury to say whether there was a substantial interruption of the plaintiff's enjoyment, and if they thought that there was, the verdict was to be for the defendant, otherwise not. They found for the plaintiff. Talfourd, Serjt. had obtained a rule to set aside this for misdirection, against which cause had been shewn on a previous day, and

Yardley and Wiles were now heard in support of the rule.—The proper mode of leaving it to the jury was, whether the enjoyment was substantial on the part of the plaintiff. It could not be said that there was an interruption unless enjoyment was first proved, and where the whole period had been a series of rustic contests and petty warfare as to the common. There was no substantial enjoyment. (Co. Litt. 114, a; Tickle v. Brown, 4 A. & E. 369; Gale and Whatley on Easements, p. 122; Bailey v. Appleyard, 8 A. & E. 161, were cited.)

By the COURT.—We think the direction was quite right. It is, indeed, the same thing as that contended for. The words "substantial interruption" and "substantial enjoyment" might equally be used. The words "claiming as of right," in the statute, clearly mean something different and less than a rightful claim.

DAY v. EDWARDS.

Pawnbroker.

In an action on the case against a pawnbroker for putting deleterious liquid into a cruet whilst it was in pledge to him, and which it contained when it was redeemed, by drinking which the plaintiff, the child of the party who redeemed it, had been seriously injured, it must be averred that the defendant knew of the nature of the liquid so used. Therefore, where the trial had been conducted upon both sides upon the supposition that negligence was sufficient, and no proof was offered of such averment, a new trial was ordered, that the opinion of the jury might be taken upon that point. Quære, whether any action would lie under the circumstances?

This was an action upon the case against the defendant, a pawnbroker, for having placed in a glass cruet, whilst in pledge to him, some nitric acid, and delivered it with its contents to the father of the plaintiff, who redeemed it, without giving him due information, whereby the plaintiff, a son of the person who so redeemed it, ignorantly drank it, and received serious injury.

At the trial the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff; and Lush had obtained a rule nisi to set it aside for misdirection, or for arrest of judgment, on the grounds that the damages were too remote, that the use of the cruet was legal, and no averment of malice.

Miller and Petersdorff shewed cause.

Humfrey, Q.C. and Lush were heard in support of the rule. These points, however, were not decided, and the argument is omitted. It appeared that at the trial the case was treated as one of negligence, and no proof offered that the defendant knew of the contents of the cruet when he delivered it out of pawn. Upon this ground

Lord DENMAN, C. J. said there must be a new trial, for the fact of knowledge on the part of the defendant, of the contents of the cruet, was not proved on the trial, or left to the jury. The trial was conducted on the supposition that proof of negligence was sufficient without proof of knowledge, and had, therefore, miscarried. It is alleged in the declaration that it was the duty of the defendant to warn people that the cruet contained poison, but, before this duty could arise, knowledge of the fact was essential. I do not, however, agree with the arguments as to the meaning of proximate cause. A person is not to be deprived of remedy because no necessary and immediate connection can be shewn between the wrongful act and the injury complained of. It is sufficient that the injury has been caused by the wrongful act of the defendant. Nor do I consider that the law is to be limited to the reported cases, where an injury is shewn to have resulted from the wrongful act of another. These questions may be raised hereafter, but, upon the ground mentioned, there must be a new trial.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

April 30 and May 22.

POTTS and OTHERS, Assignees, &c. v. EYTON and JONES.

A B had a share in a large colliery, and induced C D to open a general shop in the neighbourhood of the colliery, at which the men employed in the colliery were directed to purchase what they required. It was arranged that A B should receive a per centage upon the gross amount paid at the shop by the workmen belonging to the colliery. Held, that this did not constitute a partnership between A B and C D as to third parties.

This was an action brought by the assignees of a bankrupt banking company against the two defendants. One of them, Jones, suffered judgment by default: the other pleaded several pleas, and at the trial obtained a verdict. The points in the case appear fully in the judgment.

In the argument, Channell, Serjt. was for the defendant Eyton; Sir Thos. Wilde, Serjt. (with him Crowder, Q.C. and Archbold) for the plaintiffs.

The following authorities were cited: Ex parte Hamper, 17 Ves. jun. 404; Wagh v. Carver, 2 Hy. Black. 235; Benjamin v. Porteus, 2 Hy. Black. 590; Sandilands v. Marsh, 2 B. & A. 673.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 22.—The judgment of the Court was delivered by TINDAL, C.J.

JUDGMENT.

TINDAL, C.J.—This was an action of assumpsit for money paid by the bankrupts before their bankruptcy to the use of the defendants. The defendant Jones suffered judgment by default. The other defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and several special pleas, which it is unnecessary to notice. At the trial before me, at the sittings in London after last Michaelmas Term, it appeared that in 1828 the defendant Eyton was concerned in a colliery at Mostyn Quay, in Wales; and an agreement was entered into between him and Jones for opening a tally-shop at Mostyn Quay, not far from the colliery, for the purpose of supplying goods to the workmen of the colliery. Eyton built the shop, and his name was placed over it, and it was licensed to sell tea, &c. the license being taken out in his name. The invoices for the goods supplied to the shop were made out in Eyton's name, who paid for them. Jones managed the shop, and the workmen at Eyton's colliery were supplied with tickets, which were settled for when the wages were paid. The truck system was abolished in 1831; from that time Eyton's workmen paid at the shop for the goods, and Jones paid over to Eyton the principal part of the money received for the goods, but reserved sufficient for such small payments as were usually made at the shop. Eyton received for his own use 7 per cent. on the amount of all sales to his workmen, and Jones had all the rest of the profits of the concern, from whatever source acquired. In 1834 a change was made in the arrangement between Eyton and Jones; the latter was thenceforth to buy in his own name all goods supplied to the shop, and the payment for them was to be received by him, and he was to suffer Eyton to receive 5 per cent. instead of 7, on the amount of the sales to his workmen. Eyton objected to his name remaining over the door of the concern, but it was not removed. Jones paid Eyton 5 per cent. of the profits, Eyton's name remaining over the door till October, 1840, when a fire occurred to put an end to the business. In 1834, when Jones began to buy the goods in his own name, he opened an account with the bank; the bank failed in 1839, and at that time the balance exceeded 2,000*l.* due to them on that account. Besides the shop at Mostyn Quay, Jones, in 1834, opened three other shops in other places in his own name, and on his own account, and he supplied them with goods from the shop at Mostyn Quay. On this state of facts it was contended for the plaintiffs that they were entitled to recover this balance against Eyton, as having been a partner with Jones. I left it to the jury to say whether there was a sharing of the profit and loss between Eyton and Jones after the account was opened, and if not, whether Eyton, by his own conduct, held himself out to the world as a partner with Jones, and induced the bank to give Jones credit upon the faith of his being a partner. The jury answered both questions in the negative, and returned a verdict for the defendant. In Hilary Term a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence, was granted, and in the course of the last Term was fully argued. Our judgment was deferred, in order that we might carefully examine the evidence given at the trial; having so done, we cannot find any ground for disturbing the verdict. There was no evidence to shew that credit was in fact given to Eyton, or that the bank knew his name was over the door of the shop at Mostyn Quay, or that they supposed him to be a partner, or a person who had the management of the affair; and we think if they could have given such evidence it would no doubt have been given by their witnesses; we must assume, therefore, that credit was given to Jones alone, and if Eyton is to be made liable it must be on the ground of actual partnership between himself and Jones. It was contended that an act of partnership was proved between them, as Eyton, by taking 5 per cent. upon the sales to his workmen, received a share of the profits, and was, therefore, in point of law, a partner as to third persons. We are of opinion that the taking of the money was not sufficient to make him a partner. Traders become partners between themselves by mutual participation of profit and loss; as to third persons, they are partners if they share the profits of the concern, or share the receipts, to the amount of which the creditors of the concern would have a right to look for payment. In such a case they are to be made liable for the losses, though they may have stipulated for exemptions from this liability. Grace v. Smith, 2 W. Bl. 998; and Smith v. Watson 2 B. & C. 401. In the former of those cases the Lord Chief Justice de Grey, after laying down the rule of law in the terms stated, proceeds thus: "If any one advances or lends money to a trader, it is only lent on his general personal security. It is no specific lien upon the profits of the trade, and yet the lender is generally interested in those profits: he relies on them for repayment." And a little lower down he says, "I think the true criterion is to inquire whether Smith agreed to share the profits of the trade with Robinson, or whether he only relied on those profits as a fund of payment; a distinction not more nice than usually occurs in questions of trade or usury; the jury have said this is not payable out of the profits." So in the present case the jury have said there was no agreement to share the proceeds. This distinction has been recognised in many cases which it may suffice to mention. Dry v. Beswell, 1 Campb. 320; and Benjamin v. Porteus, 2 Hy. Bl. 590; And so in Ex parte Hamper, 17 Ves. jun. 404, Lord Eldon said, "that the distinction was so thin that he could not state it as established upon due consideration." Yet he acted on it in that case, and in Ex parte Watson, 19 Ves. jun. 461, where he said, "One who receives a salary not charged upon profits, according to a known though nice distinction, is not by that a partner." Nor does it appear to make any difference whether the money was received by way of interest, or rent, or wages, or salary, or commission on sales. It appears to us in the present case that the payment to Eyton was no other than a commission on certain sales supposed to be effected through his influence over his workmen, and is not sufficient to render him, as a matter of legal inference, liable as a partner; and that so far as the question is material that was disposed of by the jury. This view of the subject renders it unnecessary to consider whether Eyton, if a partner in the shop at Mostyn Quay, was to be held liable on the banking account. On the whole, we are of opinion that the verdict is right, and that the rule for a new trial must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

FRYCE v. BELCHER.

In an action by a private individual for damage resulting to himself personally from the commission of an unlawful act by another, the material fact of the personal injury is sufficiently averred under a per quod, and need not be more positively or expressly stated.

In an action against a returning officer for not receiving the plaintiff's vote at an election, the plaintiff averred in his declaration "that he was a burgess of the borough entitled to give his vote, &c." The defendant pleaded "that the plaintiff was not a burgess of the said borough duly qualified or entitled to vote, &c. modo ac forma." Held, that this traverse was too large.

The declaration in this case contained three counts. The first count, after setting out "that the defendant was the mayor and returning officer for the borough of Abingdon," and the issuing of a writ to the sheriff of Berkshire, which recited "that Sir Frederick Theisger, knight, the former member for the borough, had accepted the office of the attorney-general," and which "commanded the sheriff to issue his precept to the mayor and burgesses to elect a new member," and, after setting out the issuing of the sheriff's precept, accordingly charged "that the plaintiff then being, and the plaintiff avers that he was, a burgess of the said borough, entitled to give his vote, &c." and that he was ready and willing, and offered to give his vote for one Richard Caulfield, &c. and answer the questions, &c. and to take the oath, &c. but that the defendant, so being such mayor and returning officer as aforesaid, hindered and prevented him from voting. To this count the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff was not at the time in that behalf in the first count mentioned a burgess of the said borough, duly qualified or entitled to vote as a burgess, in or at the election of the said burgess, modo ac forma.

The second count varied slightly from the first, and was demurred to upon special grounds; but as the defendant asked for leave to amend without receiving any intimation from the Court, and without proceeding thoroughly into the argument, this count and the demurrer to it are omitted.

The third count set out a writ to the sheriff of Berkshire, in the same form as in the first count, and a precept from the sheriff to the defendant, being the mayor and returning officer of Abingdon, to cause a burgess to be elected for the borough of Abingdon, by virtue of which the burgesses of Abingdon were assembled to elect a burgess for the borough of Abingdon; and it alleged that, during the assembly, and before such burgess was elected, the plaintiff being a burgess of the borough, and the name of the plaintiff being on the register of voters, and standing No. 216 in the list of voters; and the plaintiff being entitled to give his vote for the choosing of a burgess, according to the exigency of the said writ, before the defendant, being the mayor and returning officer to whom it belonged to take and allow such vote, was ready and willing, and offered to give his vote for choosing R. Caulfield, esq. a burgess for that Parliament, and that it was the duty of the defendant to enter the vote of the plaintiff on the poll-book, without entering into or allowing any scrutiny before him, so being such returning officer as aforesaid, with regard to such vote; nevertheless, that the defendant, so being such mayor and returning officer as aforesaid, well knowing the premises, but contriving and wrongfully, wilfully, maliciously, and fraudulently intending to injure the plaintiff, and vex, and harass, and delay the plaintiff in the exercise of his privilege of voting, and deprive him of the benefit of his said privilege, did wrongfully order and allow a scrutiny to be held before him, the said defendant, so being such returning officer as aforesaid, to wit, at the Guildhall of the said borough, with regard to the vote of the plaintiff so tendered by him as aforesaid, and with regard to the right and qualification of him, the plaintiff, to give the said vote, and to have his said vote admitted and allowed, and did further wrongfully take upon him to adjudge and determine at and after such scrutiny so ordered and allowed as aforesaid, that the plaintiff was not then entitled, and had no qualification enabling him to give his vote at the said election, whereby the plaintiff was not only wrongfully vexed, harassed, delayed, hindered, and obstructed in the exercise of his said privilege of voting, but was then wholly deprived of the benefit of his said privilege, and a burgess of the said borough was elected for that Parliament, the vote of him, the plaintiff, being so hindered and obstructed, and without any vote of him, the said plaintiff. To this count also there was a special demurrer.

The plaintiff joined in demurrer, and demurred to the defendant's plea to the first count, as offering too large a traverse.

Talfourd, Serjt. for the defendant.—The plea to the first count is good. It is true that by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 79, the register is conclusive evidence of the voter's retaining the same qualification, but still another point may be involved, viz. his continuance to reside within the boundaries. That is the point to which the last proviso in sec. 79 is directed. Besides, the word "duly" is surplusage, and may be rejected. The plaintiff has no burden of proof thrown upon him which he had not before. The word "entitled," ex vi termini, includes that he was qualified and duly entitled. In Armani v. Castrique, 13 M. & W. 443, the declaration described a bill of exchange generally, and a plea that A B did not indorse "the said inland bill," was held good on special demurrer. The argument upon the other point will sufficiently appear from the judgment. (6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, ss. 79, 81, 82, were referred to.) The most important is sec. 82, which enacts (inter alia) that "no scrutiny shall hereafter be allowed by or before any returning officer with regard to any vote given or tendered at any such election, any law, statute, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding."

Kinglake, Serjt. for the plaintiff.—First, the plea is bad. It introduces new matter not found in the declaration, and traverses it. It tenders immaterial issues. It is impossible for the plaintiff to know in what sense the word "qualified" is used in the plea. It may raise a variety of issues as to whether the plaintiff has become disqualified since the decision of the revising barrister, whether he has changed his residence, or whether there be any other latent objection to his vote. If we took issue, we might be met at the trial by proof that the decision of the revising barrister was improper.

TINDAL, C. J.—The traverse is bad on special demurrer. The declaration contains two distinct allegations; one, that the plaintiff stood No. 216 on the register; and the second, that he was entitled to vote. The first plea is too large a traverse of the latter allegation.

Upon the other count Kinglake, Serjt. referred to 2 & 3 Wm. 4, c. 45, ss. 59, 66; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, ss. 79—82, 86, 97; Ashley v. White, 2 Ld. Raym. 938; Schinotti v. Burnsted, 6 T. R. 646; Taylor v. Heniker, 12 A. & E. 488; Blafeld v. Payne, 4 B. & Ad. 410; Bailiffs of Tewkesbury v. Diston, 6 East, 462, per Lord Ellenborough; Weller v. Baker, the Dippers' case, 2 Will. 422.

JUDGMENT.

The Judgment of the Court was now delivered by TINDAL, C. J.—The questions arising on the first count, and on the second count of the declaration, were disposed of on the argument, by the defendant being allowed to amend the plea, and to withdraw his demurrer, and plead over to the second count. The only remaining question, therefore, is, whether the third count, which is specially demurred to, is open to objection. His Lordship read the material parts of the count. On the part of the defendant, it was contended that the words following the words "whereby" could not be considered as being an averment of matter of fact, but merely matter of conclusion or inference drawn from the matters previously alleged, and that the preceding matter did not disclose with due certainty any cause of action, it not being alleged that the scrutiny was held during the election, nor that the vote of the plaintiff was not entered on the poll-book, and reckoned up with the others. On the part of the plaintiff it was contended that the holding of a scrutiny by the returning officer being expressly prohibited by the Act 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 82, the action would lie for holding the scrutiny, though no damage resulted to the plaintiff; for which Blafeld v. Payne, Taylor v. Heniker, and the Dippers' case, 2 Wilson, were cited; and it was also contended, that if damage was necessary to be alleged, there was a sufficient allegation of damage to the plaintiff. No case was cited to shew whether the matter alleged after the word "whereby" is to be considered as amounting on demurrer to a sufficient averment of matter of fact; nor have we found any decision on the point, although in the case of Colson v. Perry, 2 Rolle's Reports, 379, the point was incidentally discussed. In that case the plaintiff declared that Queen Elizabeth, being seised of the manor of S—, granted him thirty acres, parcel of the manor by copy, and granted four acres, parcel of the said manor, to the defendant, and alleged that the copyholders of the said thirty acres have at all times used to have common for certain cattle, from the 1st day of August until the Feast of All Saints, in the four acres, and shewing that the defendant on the 1st of May enclosed the said four acres with hedges and ditches per quod, he could not have his common, &c. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff. It was moved in arrest of judgment for not alleging continuance of the enclosure until and after the 1st of August; but all the judges agreed that after verdict the judgment should not be arrested; but Dodridge J. said that the per quod estant le inclosure del'plea does not amount to an averment; the per quod is a reduction and inference out of the preceding declaration, and will not amount to an averment, for it is a conclusion, and not a matter of action; but he agreed that after verdict the declaration was good: but Ley, C. J. said that the per quod amounted to an averment. It is to be observed that matters subsequent to the per quod were held in that case to be a sufficient averment after the verdict, not only of what was directly stated, but of a matter not stated, but only to be collected by inference, namely, that the inclosure of the four acres continued after the 1st of May, and until the 17th of August. The allegation in question would perhaps be open to a special demurrer on that ground, but it does not follow from thence that the words following the per quod in a declaration of this nature are in all cases to be considered as matter of conclusion and inference only; on the contrary, the course of pleading shews that they are sometimes to be looked upon as allegations of matters of fact. In Rastell's Entries, 613, is a precedent of an action by a master for the beating of his servant, with no allegation of loss of service except under the per quod; that the loss of service is a material fact required to be proved is clear. It is said in Mary's case, 9 Coke, "If my servant is beat, the master shall not have an action for this battery, unless the battery is so great, that by reason thereof he loses the service of his servant; but the servant himself for every small battery shall have an action; and the reason of the difference is, that the master has not any damage by the personal beating of his servant, but by reason of a per quod, namely per quod servitium amisit; so that the original act is not the cause of his action, but consequent upon it, namely, the loss of his service is the cause of his action; for be the battery greater or less, if the master doth not lose the service of his servant, he shall not have an action." So, in the same case, it was said, "For every feeding by the cattle of a stranger the commoner shall not have an assize or an action on the case, as his case is; but the feeding ought to be such, per quod the commoner, &c. common of pasture for his cattle, &c. habere non potuit sed proficuum suum inde per totius id tempus amisit." So that if the trespass be so small that he has not any loss, but sufficient in an ample manner remains for him, "the commoner shall not take them damage-tenant, nor have any action for it." And a little lower down it is said—"So in the case at bar, the lord of the soil shall have an action for trespass done in the waste or common, as an immediate trespass to him, be it greater or less; but the commoner shall not have an action but by consequence, viz. if the trespass be such, per quod proficuum communie sue, &c. amisit, or that he could not have his common in so beneficial a manner as he had before." It has, indeed, been subsequently considered that the mere invasion of the commoner's right may furnish a ground of action against a stranger; but still the doctrine so laid down in Mary's case is applicable to the present question; for as the Court in that case held the action maintainable, on the ground that it contained the allegation per quod proficuum communie sue amisit, it follows that they considered the matter alleged, after the per quod, to be a sufficient averment of a material fact. So in the case of a nuisance to a highway, whereby the plaintiff has received a particular damage, the precedents shew that the damage which is the cause of action may be alleged under the per quod. The same in Mr. Chitty's Precedents, p. 241, or what does not seem materially to differ, under the words ratione cuius, &c. to be found in Winch's Entries, 47. Another ground of objection urged by the defendant was, that the count was defective in not shewing how the damage stated after the per quod resulted from the holding of the scrutiny, which, for any thing that appeared, might have been held after the election was finished and the return made, and if the matter which follows the per quod, was to be looked upon as matter of inference and conclusion only, it might well be argued it was an inference not legitimately drawn from the premises; but if it is to be considered, as we think it is, as an averment of a matter of fact, it will be sufficient if the damage in question might possibly have resulted from the unlawful act of holding the scrutiny. It was clearly possible that the delay arising from holding a scrutiny might have had the effect of preventing the plaintiff from exercising his right of voting, and if such was the fact, there is no doubt the action would be maintainable, the act of the defendant being wrongful, and having caused a particular damage to the plaintiff. As the defendant has obtained leave to amend his pleadings in relation to the other count, he ought to have leave, if he desires it, to withdraw his demurrer to this count, and to plead to it.

Talfourd, Serjt. accepted the offer.

Leave to amend: otherwise, judgment for the plaintiff.

COOPER v. SHEPHERD.

To an action of trover for a bedstead, the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff had recovered judgment in a previous action against B. W. for the conversion of the same bedstead to the full value of the bedstead, and that the plaintiff had received satisfaction for that judgment. The plea then stated that the conversion by B. W. was a conversion not later than the conversion in the declaration mentioned, and that before the conversion in the declaration mentioned, B. W. sold the bedstead to the defendant, who paid for the same, and that the taking, under such sale, was the conversion complained of in the declaration. Held, on special demurrer, that the plea was a good plea in confession and avoidance.

Trover for a bedstead.

Plea.—That the plaintiff heretofore and long before the commencement of this suit, to wit, &c. in this court of our Lady the Queen, &c. impleaded one B.

W. in an action of trover for converting, to wit, on the day and year in that action mentioned, to wit, &c. among other goods and chattels in the declaration in that action mentioned, the same identical bedstead in the declaration in this action mentioned, and such proceedings were thereupon had in that action that afterwards and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, &c. the plaintiff, by the consideration and judgment of the said Court, recovered in the said action against the said B. W. 75*l.* for his damages, which he had sustained on occasion of the converting by the said B. W. of the said bedstead, and the said other goods and chattels in the declaration in that action mentioned, and also 12*l.* for his costs and charges, &c. pro ut patet per recordam. And the defendant further says that, after the recovery of the said judgment against the said B. W. as aforesaid, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, &c. the said B. W. fully paid and satisfied the plaintiff the said several sums of 75*l.* and 12*l.* in form aforesaid recovered against him, and the plaintiff then took and received the same of and from the said B. W. in full satisfaction of the said judgment. And the defendant further says, that the said damages, so far as the same were estimated, assessed, recovered, paid, and received as aforesaid in respect of the said bedstead were estimated and assessed and were recovered and paid and received as aforesaid, as and for, and in respect of, and as the full value of the said bedstead, and not otherwise, and were and amounted in fact to the full value of the said bedstead. And the defendant further says, that the said conversion of the said bedstead by the said B. W. for which the said action against the said B. W. was brought, and in respect of which the said damages were estimated, assessed, recovered, and paid, and received as aforesaid, was a conversion not later in point of time than the conversion above complained of against the defendant; and that just before, and at the time of the conversion of the said bedstead by the defendant above complained of against him, the said bedstead being then in the possession of the said B. W. he the said B. W. to wit, on the day and year above-mentioned, sold and delivered the same to the defendant, at and for a certain reasonable price in that behalf, to wit, &c.; and the defendant then paid to the said B. W. who then accepted and received of and from him the defendant, a large sum of money, to wit, &c. as and for, and in full satisfaction and discharge of the said price of the said bedstead as last aforesaid, and the defendant then had and took, and received the said bedstead of and from the said B. W. to and for his the defendant's own use, and as and for his own, under and by virtue of such sale and delivery as aforesaid. And the defendant further says, that the having, taking, and receiving of the same, by the defendant as aforesaid, is the same conversion of the said bedstead, as is above complained of against him the defendant.—Verification.

Special demurrer, assigning for grounds, that it did not sufficiently appear by the plea that the conversion by the said B. W. was after the plaintiff was possessed, or that the plaintiff was not lawfully possessed between the times of the two conversions, or that B. W. was possessed at the time when he sold to the defendant; that a recovery for one conversion was no reason why damages should not be recovered for another; that the plea was an argumentative traverse of plaintiff's possession; that it did not appear that the recovery against B. W. or the payment by B. W. was before the conversion by the defendant; that the plea confessed without avoiding, &c.

Dowling, Serjt. in support of the demurrer.

Telford, Serjt. (with him Hawkins) in support of the defendant's plea.

JUDGMENT.

June 6.—TINDAL, C.J. delivered the judgment of the Court, which, excepting the statement of the pleadings, which is omitted, was as follows:—The argument before us has been, that the plea is bad, either upon the ground that if taken as a traverse of the plaintiff's possession, it is argumentative only; or, if taken as a confession, there is no avoidance; but we think the plea is unobjectionable on either of these grounds. A plaintiff in trover, where no special damage is alleged, is not entitled to damages beyond the value of the chattel he has lost; and after he has once received full value, he is not entitled to further compensation in respect of the same loss. And according to the doctrine of the cases which were cited in the argument, by a former recovery in trover, and payment of damages, the plaintiff's right of property is barred, and the property vested in the defendant in the action. Adams v. Broughton, 2 Strange, 1078, and Jenkins's Cent. p. 189 (Cent. 4, Ca. 88), where it is laid down, "A, in trespass against B for taking a horse recovers damages; by this recovery, and execution had thereon, the property in the horse is vested in B. Solutio pretii emptionis loco habetur." Now, the present plea ought, as it appears to us, to be construed as alleging a sale by B. W. to the defendant, before the plaintiff recovered judgment against B. W.; and if the plea be so construed it would be a confession of a cause of action avoided by matter subsequent; namely, by recovery and satisfaction for the same cause of action from another; for the damage to the plaintiff is the cause of his action, and the loss of the chattel is that damage; and though the conversion by the defendant is different from the conversion by B. W. and may make either the one or the other liable to the plaintiff at his election, yet satisfaction from one forms the defence for the other. In Bird v. Randall, 3 Burrows, 1345, a recovery from a servant of damages for leaving the service of his master was a bar to an action against a defendant for seducing the servant to leave his master's service; because the loss of the service was the damage, and that damage was compensated for in the first action. But if, on the other hand, the plea be construed to allege the sale to the defendant to be after the recovery by the plaintiff from B. W. still the plea as to this point may be sustained, as giving what has been called in modern cases implied colour to the plaintiff; for it admits that the plaintiff had at one time a right of property, but shews it to be barred by the matter of the plea; like the case of a plea, to an action of trover, of a sale to the defendant in market overt, or a taking by the defendant as a waife; which pleas may be pleaded in trover or trespass. Comyns v. Boyer, Cro. Eliz. 404; Legfield's case, 10 Rep. 86; Unwin v. St. Quintin, 11 M. & W. 277. And as to the further objection, that the plea contained a confession of the cause of action, but did not also contain an avoidance thereof, inasmuch as it did not sufficiently appear that the possession by B. W. in respect of which the plaintiff recovered, continued till the sale by him to the defendant; and that it was consistent with the plea that the plaintiff might have acquired the property a second time, which B. W. first wrongfully took from him, before the sale by him to the defendant; we think the possession of B. W. as first alleged in the plea, and which became rightful by the recovery in trover and payment of damages, must be taken to have continued until the sale to the defendant took place, inasmuch as nothing appears to the contrary. The plea alleges in effect that B. W. took, and, being possessed, sold to the defendant; and although it would have been more certain if it had been pleaded that he, being so possessed, sold, still it appears to us sufficiently certain, and that no change in the possession is to be presumed. We therefore think the judgment ought to be given for the defendant.

Judgment for the defendant.

DOE dem. ATKINSON v. FAWCETT.

Where testator being seized in fee of one moiety of a house devised "my moiety of the house which my son R. A. now lives in, to my son R. A.": this was held to pass the fee.

This was an action of ejectment tried before Rolfe, B. at the last summer assizes for the county of York. The lessor of the plaintiff claimed one half of the messuage in respect of which the ejectment was brought as devisee, and the other half as heir at law of one George Atkinson. No question arose with reference to the former half, but with regard to the latter it appeared that George Atkinson, being seized in fee-simple of one moiety of the house in question, by his will disposed of it as follows:—"I give and bequeath to my son, Richard Atkinson, my moiety of the house which he now lives in, and all my personal property new in his keeping." Upon the part of the plaintiff it was contended that these words gave Richard Atkinson only an estate for life, and that, Richard Atkinson being dead, the lessor of the plaintiff was entitled as heir at law to George Atkinson. Rolfe, B. being of this opinion, directed a verdict for the plaintiff. In the following Michaelmas Term, Channell, Serjt. obtained a rule to show cause why there should not be a new trial upon the ground of misdirection, and argued that the words in the will passed the whole fee. In Easter Term last,

Sir Thos. Wilde, Serjt. shewed cause, and contended that the words "my moiety," were descriptive only of the thing devised, and not of the quantum of estate intended to be conveyed, and that therefore, as there were no words of inheritance, the devisee took only a life estate. He quoted 2 Jarman on Wills, p. 192; Viner's Abridg. Devise, L. a, pl. 11; Pettywood v. Cooke, Cro. Eliz. 52; Bebb v. Penoyre, 11 East, 160; Bailis v. Gale, 2 Ves. sen. 48; Middleton v. Swayne, Skinner, 339; Roe v. Bacon, 4 M. & S. 366; Paris v. Miller, 5 M. & S. 408; Doe dem. Clarke v. Clarke, 1 Cr. & M. 39; Doe dem. Ashby v. Baines, 2 C. M. & R. 23; Doe dem. Roberts v. Roberts, 7 M. & W. 382; Doe v. Gwillim, 5 B. & Ad. 122, 2 Nev. & M. 247, S.C.

Channell, Serjt. in support of the rule, maintained, first, that the words, "my moiety of the house" denote the interest and pass the fee; secondly, that the words are not limited by what follows, viz., "which my son now lives in," but that these last are words merely of local description; thirdly, that the presumption that the testator intended to pass all his interest is strengthened by the association of the words whereby he gives his son absolutely "all his personal property" now in the son's keeping. Besides the authorities cited on the other side, he referred to Doe dem. Templeman v. Martin, 4 B. & Ad. 785, per Parke, J.; Andrew v. Southouse, 5 T. R. 293.

Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

June 6.—TINDAL, C.J. delivered the judgment of the Court.—The question in this case was, whether Richard Atkinson, the son of the testator, took an estate in fee, or for life only, in a moiety of the house devised to him by his father's will. The devise was seized in fee-simple of one moiety of the house in which his son was living, and being so seized, devised in these terms—"I give and bequeath to my son Richard Atkinson my moiety of the house which he now lives in, and all my personal property now in his keeping;" and the answer to this question depends, as it appears to us, upon the proper interpretation to be put upon the words "my moiety." If those words do in their natural and ordinary signification import the interest which the testator had in the house, then they will carry the whole interest he had, that is, the fee; but if, on the other hand, the words only have the narrower meaning, and are construed to import no more than one half of the house, then undoubtedly the devise of the half of the house would be a devise for life only. It appears to us that the word "moiety," which is accompanied generally, whether in pleading or in conveying, with the words "half part" as synonymous with it or explanatory of its force, carries with it the signification of the part or interest which the party takes in any subject-matter; so that when a man devises his moiety, he devises his half part, or the interest which he has in the thing devised. The case of Pettywood v. Cooke, Cro. Eliz. 52, which was relied upon in argument on the part of the defendant, does not in any way affect the present question. In that case the devise was not seized of any particular part or interest in the fee, but of the entirety. The devise was not, as here, of the devisee's third part; but being seized in fee of three several houses, he devised one of them to each of his three children and their heirs; and if any of them died without issue, then the survivors should enjoy, totam illam partem, to be equally divided between them. The judges held in that case, that no more than an estate for life was devised by the devise over; and construed totam illam partem, to mean totam illam domum. In that case the words limiting the devise had cut down the estate of the daughters to an estate tail, and made the devise, in effect, no more than a devise in tail, with several remainders over, without specifying the estate of the remaindermen, which must have been for life only. And even as to this case, Lord Ellenborough, in Bebb v. Penoyre, 11 East, 160, expressed a strong doubt whether that decision was right. In the case before the Court, that of a devise to a brother of "my half part of four freehold houses which I hold with him," he intimates an opinion that he should be disposed to think the words sufficient to carry the fee. And the same learned judge has expressed the same opinion upon the devise of "my share" in Paris v. Miller, 5 M. & S. 408. He observes, "This is not the devise of a portion which the devisee has carved out of the entirety; it existed in her as it was devised. The words 'my share,' as it seems to me, were used as denoting the interest;" which view of the case was adopted by the Court. Upon these grounds, we think the words of this devise are sufficient to carry the fee, and the rule for a new trial must be made absolute.

Rule absolute for a new trial, unless the plaintiff consents to enter the verdict for one moiety for him, and one moiety for the defendant.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

ON ERROR FROM THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

(Before PARKE, ALDERSON, and ROLFE, BB.—COLTMAN, MAULE, CRESSWELL, and ERLE, JJ.)
WEDLAKE v. GARDNER.

Argued May 12.—Determined June 15.

A patent was taken out for a certain improvement in a machine for cutting turnips; this improvement consisting in a peculiar diagonal arrangement of knives within a rotary drum-cutter, by which arrangement the knives were brought successively into operation, thus obviating several objections to the rotary drum-cutter which had previously existed. In an action brought for an infringement of the patent, it was objected that the terms of the specification were sufficiently comprehensive to include the drum-cutter, which was an undoubtedly old invention, as well as the arrangement of the knives above-mentioned, or that at all events it must be taken to include every arrangement of the knives on the diagonal principle, and that in either case the patent was void as claiming an old invention. Held, that the specification must be read in a fair and candid spirit, with a desire to be instructed by it, and not merely to discover defects in it; and that when so read, the specification must be taken to refer to that peculiar adaptation of the knives to the old invention, which was new, as appeared by the evidence at the trial. If a specification sufficiently explains the whole principle of the invention claimed by the patentee, it is not necessary to set forth the results of that principle.

This case came before the Court of Exchequer Chamber in the shape of a bill of exceptions to the direction of the learned judge (Patteson) at the trial of this case, which was an action for the infringement of a patent for the invention of a certain improvement in a machine for cutting Swedish and other turnips, mangold-wurzel, and other roots used as food for sheep, horned cattle, and other animals. To the declaration, which was in the usual form, there were several pleas—1st, not guilty; 2nd, that the plaintiff was not the true inventor; 3rd, that the invention was not new; 4th, that the plaintiff had not sufficiently described the nature of his said invention; 5th, that the alleged invention was not an improvement; and, lastly, a plea which set out the specification; and then stated that, though part of the alleged invention was new, a part of it was old, and that the specification did not sufficiently describe that part. The plaintiff denied the last plea, and, by the general replication de injuria, joined issue on or traversed the others. The specification, as set out in the declaration, was in substance as follows: "The invention was in the first place described as 'my invention of certain improvements on machines for cutting Swedish and other turnips, mangold-wurzel, and other roots used as food for sheep, horned cattle, and other animals.' The specification then proceeded to refer to the accompanying plan of a rotary cutter as shewn in operation; this rotary cutter being formed as a drum mounted upon an axle, certain parts of its periphery having different radii, in order to produce the recesses into which the roots of the turnips were to descend. It then proceeded to refer to the plates, and described the operation of the machine in these words: 'The rotary cutter thus constructed would then appear as shewn in perspective at figure 6, and in revolving upon its axle would bring the knives progressively into operation one after another, their upper cutting edges being all coincident in the same cylindrical curve, and their radial edges revolving in parallel circles at right angles to the axis of the drum.' Then it went on to say, that in this way 'the knives will be brought successively into operation, and so cut the roots into strips or narrow pieces, which pieces or strips will pass through the apertures behind the knives into the interior of the drum, and will from thence fall through the shoot below on to the floor, or into any vessel provided beneath to receive them. By the construction of the knife shewn and the mode of attaching it to the drum, I am enabled to replace any one of the knives accidentally broken. But I sometimes construct the knives by bending plates of steel in the form shewn in perspective at figure 7, the cutting edges being placed in the same relative positions as before described. When the plates are affixed to the cast-iron part of the drum, the curved part of the plates forms that portion of the periphery of the drum marked b. in the former figure. I wish it to be understood that I do not intend to confine myself to any precise number of cutters or knives to be affixed to a rotary drum, nor do I at all times employ two sets of cutters, as shewn in the figures referred to, and though I have described the knives as placed in two series on opposite sides of the middle plates of the drum, yet I do not confine myself to that arrangement, as I sometimes place the knives in a diagonal range along the drum from end to end, which would be illustrated by cutting the drum into two parallel portions at right angles to its axis in the dotted line shewn in figure 2. Lastly, I wish it to be understood that I claim the adaptation of the particular form of knife with two cutting edges, shewn in the drawing, and also the placing of those knives in diagonal ranges in the manner described, or any other suitable construction of knives, the faces of the radial cutting edges of which shall stand parallel to the ends of the drum, and to each other.' The specification then referred to another example of the adaptation of a series of straight knives arranged in conjunction with the diagonal cutting edges. On the trial, several witnesses were examined, some of whom gave evidence that no machine like the plaintiff's had been seen before,—though there were machines, and particularly a machine invented by one Snowdon, which cut by means of knives arranged on a drum, but that the knives were so placed in the machine as to make their cutting at the same moment, one knife cutting horizontally, or in a cylindrical direction as the drum went round, whilst the others were vertical or parallel to the sides of the drum, and the effect was said to be that the machine required great force to be used in the moving power, and that the strips of turnips were compressed in passing in the intervals between the knives, so as to lead to the clogging of the machine. The evidence also was, that the plaintiff's machine worked with less power, because the knives being arranged diagonally came into action successively; and that as one finished its work before another began, there was no compression of the slices of turnips, and therefore no clogging. Some witnesses also stated, that there was, before the patented machine, a machine described as a table cutter, which had vertical and horizontal cutters, which severally struck the turnips at the same time, but slightly behind each other, so that the pieces of turnips were jammed together in passing through the machine. The witnesses likewise said that the plaintiff's invention was of great practical utility. It was admitted that the defendant made and sold machines similar to those of the plaintiff, cutting step by step, and which, as one of the witnesses said, acted on the same principle. It was contended at the trial, on behalf of the defendant below (the plaintiff in error), that the plaintiff below was not, upon the evidence, entitled to recover, because the principle of his invention was not new, but was the same as that of Snowdon's machine. It was also contended, that the specification was not sufficiently precise in its terms, and that it must be taken to include every rotary cutter, consisting of a drum furnished with knives, or, at all events, every species of knives arranged in the drum on what is called the diagonal principle, and that on either construction the invention was open to the objection already stated, that, viz. of being old. It was further argued, that the specification was too vague, and did not sufficiently distinguish the old from the new parts of the invention, nor set forth with distinctness the principle of the patent claimed. The nature of these objections will be better understood by a reference to the judgment of the Court as given below.

Hill, Q.C. for the plaintiff in error.—The plaintiff in error is willing to admit that his machine would be an infringement of the defendant's patent if that patent is valid, but he denies its validity. The patent is for an improvement in a machine for cutting turnips, &c. used as food for sheep and cattle, and consists in the peculiar construction of a rotary cutter, and in the adaptation of that cutter to the machine for cutting turnips. The object of this improvement is to prevent the necessity of squeezing the turnips and clogging the machine; and it is worked by less power than the old machine, inasmuch as the knives come into operation successively. The patent is void, because the specification is too large for the invention. The specification applies to the rotary cutter, which is a cylinder or drum, armed with knives; but this was not the invention of Gardner, the patentee, for he was not the first who applied the drum armed with knives to the purpose stated in the patent. The specification is not confined, as it ought to have been, to the mode by which the knives have been adapted to the object in view. Another objection to this patent is, that the patentee claims as his invention the placing of the knives diagonally; whereas he was not the inventor of the diagonal principle, but only of the particular mode in which that principle has been applied to this machine; and it is a well-known rule, that a patentee must not leave the subject-matter of his patent in doubt, but must clearly ascertain and describe the nature of his invention. (Hindmarch on Patents, 183, 184—188, and cases there cited; Bovill v. Moore, 2 Marshall, 211; S. C. Davison's Patent Cases, 364; Harmer v. Playne, 11 East, 101.) The objections to this patent are, then, twofold; 1st, that the patentee claims too much; 2ndly, that he does not sufficiently point out what he does claim.

Watson, Q.C. for the defendant in error.—The answer to the objections which have been raised to the validity of this patent is very short. The defendant in error claims as his invention the arranging the knives diagonally in the drum, so that they may cut successively—he claims a particular species of rotary cutter on the diagonal principle. He referred to Minter v. Wells, Webster's Patent Cases, 127; Carpenter v. Smith, Webster's Patent Cases, 530; Macfarland v. Price, Webster's Patent Cases, 75.

Hill, in reply, referred to Macfarland v. Price.

June 15.—PARKER, B. now proceeded to deliver the judgment of the Court. His lordship first adverted to the evidence, and to the pleadings on the record, of which an abstract has been given above, and then proceeded thus:—The counsel for the defendant made eight objections, which are fully set out in the bill of exceptions, and insisted that on all or some of those the learned judge ought to have directed the jury to find that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. He refusing to do so, and having directed the jury to the contrary, an exception is taken to his direction. The objections taken are in substance three: first, that the principle of the plaintiff's invention was not new, and was the same as that of Snowdon's machine; secondly, that the specification was not very clear, but must be taken to describe the subject-matter of the patent as being the rotary cutter, consisting of a drum furnished with knives, and that the cutter formed of the drum and the knives was old, and consequently the invention being in part not new, the patent was void; and further, that if the specification included every species of cutting by knives diagonally, it would be void for a similar reason, and that the table-machine was constructed on that principle; 3rdly, that the specification is not sufficient, for that it did not sufficiently describe the old and the new, nor describe the principle of the patent, nor state the angle at which the knives are to be placed. The two latter objections were those mainly insisted upon before us, and properly so; because there can be no doubt that the principle of the plaintiff's invention, which is a machine to cut by steps, is different from that of Snowdon's machine in which the knives cut simultaneously, and from that of the table cutter, which, though it operated partly in the same way, is quite a different sort of machine; and we are of opinion that neither of the other objections are well founded. If we look, as we ought to look, at the whole specification in a fair and candid spirit, with a desire to be instructed by it, and not merely to discover defects in it, then if the specification, which explains what the patentee himself claims, had really comprised every sort of cutting machine, consisting of a drum with knives, no doubt it would have been void; for we think the machine of Snowdon was decidedly of that description, and was unquestionably an old invention. So, if the specification had claimed all sorts of machines for cutting diagonally, not simultaneously, it would also have been void; but we think this is not the meaning of the specification, which does not claim every kind of cutter with a drum, or every species of diagonal cutter; but only a particular species of drum cutter in which the knives are placed diagonally. The evidence was that this species of cutting was new. If Snowdon's machine had been first used subsequently to the date of the patent, we think that would have been no infringement of it; nor would the table-cutter have been an infringement. The next objection is as to the sufficiency of the specification, and, admitting that the plaintiff's is an invention of a particular species of a drum-cutter, it is argued that it is insufficient, because it does not properly describe the principle of the patent, nor state the angle at which the knives ought to be placed; but it appears to all of us that it is sufficiently clear, and that the knives are to be so placed as that one shall finish its work before the other commences, which is the whole principle of the machine, and that it was not necessary to state what the result of that principle did consist in, viz. the non-compression of the strips of turnips, the prevention of clogging, and the smallest expenditure of moving power. As to the angle at which the knives ought to be placed, the specification itself does not state it, nor could it do so, for there is no certain angle. It must depend on two things—the width of the strips to which it may be convenient to the person who uses the machine to cut the turnips, and the length of the vertical knives used. And when the specification is considered in conjunction with the evidence, a competent person would have no difficulty in constructing according to it a proper machine; nor have we any difficulty in deciding that the principle of the defendant's machine is the same as the plaintiff's, of which it is consequently an infringement. The learned judge's direction is therefore right, and the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench must be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

The Court gave judgment in the following cases, which will be reported at the earliest practicable period:—

After delivering the above judgments, the case of Gosssett v. Howard was called on, and the arguments of the Attorney-General, who appeared for the plaintiff in error, were not concluded at the rising of the Court.

ERROR FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH.

TINDAL, C.J., delivered the judgment of the Court in the case of Partridge v. The Governor and Company of the Bank of England, reversing the judgment of the Court below, as to the 1st and 2nd counts in the declaration, and affirming that judgment as to the last count.

WEDLAKE v. GARDNER.—Judgment in this case was likewise delivered by PARKER, B. The report will be found supra.

The arguments of the Attorney-General were then concluded in the case of Gosssett v. Howard, and Petersdoff, for the defendant in error, was part heard. No day was named for the farther hearing of this case at the rising of the Court; it will, therefore, stand over, we presume, till the sitting of the Court after Michaelmas Term ensuing.

ERROR FROM THE COMMON PLEAS.

CLIFT v. SCHWABE.

Judgment reversed.

M'ALPINE v. MANGWALL.—This was an action for the infringement of a patent, which had been tried before Tindal, C.J., to whose direction to the jury the plaintiff in error took exception. The patent was entitled as being for improvements in machinery for stretching, drying, and finishing woven fabrics, and the object of the invention was to clear out the starch from between the meshes of such woven fabrics or melins, whilst undergoing the process of stretching, drying, and finishing, by means of machinery, which gave to the same on which the starch was stretched a diagonal motion; this motion had, previously to the invention of the patentee (the plaintiff below), been produced by manual labour, and the patent was consequently for the machinery by which this motion was communicated to the old invention. The exception to the running up of the Lord Chief Justice was, that his lordship ought to have directed the jury that the specification was not by its terms confined to that portion of the entire machine which was new, and that it was bad for not distinguishing the new from the old. Several other points were taken in the course of the argument, which it would be useless to report at length, because the Court gave judgment upon the form of the exceptions as disclosed upon the record. They thought that it did not sufficiently appear what the direction of the learned judge really was, and that no misdirection being set forth in the special case on which the Court was called upon to give judgment, the judgment of the Court below must be affirmed. *Webster for the plaintiff in Error. Rex v. ELIZABETH JONES.

Larceny of a post letter.—Intercepting a post letter, and burning it.

A servant about to quit the service of her mistress applied to another person for a situation, and was promised an engagement if the answer of her former mistress to a letter inquiring as to her character should be satisfactory. That letter was written and posted; but the servant, having been in the mean time dismissed by her former mistress, and told that she would not give her a character, went to the post-office, and applied for her mistress's letters, which were given to her. She then took from the rest the letter containing the inquiry as to her character, and burnt it. The rest she sent to her mistress. Upon an indictment for stealing a post letter, held that she was properly convicted.

The prisoner was indicted before the Lord Chief Baron, at the last assizes for the county of Hereford, for stealing a post letter, and was convicted upon her own confession, subject to the opinion of the judges upon the following case:—

The prisoner, Elizabeth Jones, pleaded guilty to an indictment under 1 Viet. c. 36, s. 28, for stealing, at Ross, from an officer of the post-office, a post letter, the property of her Majesty's Postmaster-General.

The prisoner had been cook in the employ of Mrs. Garbett, of Upton Bishop, whose service she was about to leave, having herself given notice to do so, and was in treaty with a Mrs. Dangerfield, of Cheltenham, for a similar situation. Mrs. Dangerfield had consented to employ her, if a satisfactory answer from Mrs. Garbett should be returned to a letter to be written for the purpose of making inquiries respecting her character; this letter, the subject of the present indictment, was written by Mrs. Dangerfield, directed to Mrs. Garbett, and posted at Cheltenham, was from thence duly forwarded to the post-office at Ross.

Mrs. Garbett having found fault with the prisoner for allowing the friend of another servant to breakfast in the kitchen without her leave, discharged her from her service, and told her that a character would not be given to her. The day after her dismissal she went to the post-office at Ross, and there applied to the clerk on duty for the letter from Cheltenham, addressed to Mrs. Garbett, stating that she was a servant in Mrs. Garbett's employ, and that Mrs. Garbett expected a letter from Cheltenham that morning, which she was to take; but upon being informed that the one letter by itself could not be given, she first took from the office all the letters for Mr. and Mrs. Garbett, including that written by Mrs. Dangerfield, and then selected the one which was the subject of the present indictment, and burnt it, but delivered the others to the person who was in the habit of conveying the letters from the Ross post-office to the inhabitants of Upton Bishop, and they reached Mr. and Mrs. Garbett in safety.

The question for the opinion of the Judges is, whether the taking and destroying of the letter under these circumstances amounted to larceny.

Huddleston, for the prisoner.—This is a conviction upon an indictment under the 28th section of 7 Wm. 4 and 1 Viet. c. 36; and to support it, all the ingredients of a larceny at common law must appear; but here there is a total absence of one material ingredient, viz. the lucrum causid. All the definitions of larceny, implicitly or expressly, shew that the taking, to be felonious, must be animo furandi and lucri causid. (4 Blacks. Com. 229; 2 East's P. C. c. 16, s. 2; and per Grose, J. in R. v. Hammond, 2 Leach, 1089.) It is not contended that the lucrum, as here used, means only pecuniary gain; it is satisfied by proof of any advantage which may be measured by a pecuniary amount; and its meaning is well illustrated by the sentence in Terence—"Quid mihi lucri curi te fallere?" Some decisions have certainly carried the meaning of that word very far; as in the case of a servant stealing his master's corn to give to his master's horses; but that is an extent which the criminal law commissioners have designated as ridiculous. R. v. Cabbage (Russ. & Ry. 292) does not support the marginal note, which states that it is not necessary that the taking should be lucri causid; for in that case there was the greatest advantage to one of the prisoners. In R. v. Morfit (Russ. & Ry. 307), R. v. Handley (Car. & M. 547), R. v. Gruncell (9 Car. & P. 365), Re Jacklin (1 New S. C. 208, 13 L. J. N. S. M. C. 139), R. v. Richards (1 Car. & K. 529), R. v. Bligh-ton (Dickenson's Q. S. 202, 4th ed.), although an extended meaning was given to the words lucri causid, still it was held to be a necessary ingredient in the offence. Now here there was no gain or advantage to the prisoner by intercepting and destroying the letter; it was a letter which she herself had put in motion; and her obtaining a situation did not depend upon it. It would have been a different thing if she had intercepted an answer, which she believed to be unsatisfactory. Here, she goes, as it were, to take her own letter; for Mrs. Dangerfield was only the agent of the prisoner for the purpose of making inquiries as to her character. Suppose she had written the letter herself, the stopping it might be a fraud upon the post-office, but would it be a larceny? R. v. Godfrey (8 Car. & P. 563) is an authority for saying that it would not. Although the post-office considers all letters in the course of transmission through the post the property of the Postmaster-General, still the prisoner might well have considered this letter as her own; and if so, she was not guilty of a larceny; and this quite independently of the strict question of the law, whether the property of a letter is in the sender or addressee. Lastly, this was a false pretence, and not a larceny, because by the delivery of the letter to the prisoner the property was parted with.

Bros. for the Crown.—It is admitted that this offence must contain all the ingredients of larceny at common law, and here all that is necessary appears. There can be no question as to the property, because the Act of Parliament (sec. 40) expressly provides that the property may be laid in the Postmaster-General; and the case, therefore, is, that the prisoner has taken the chattel of another by means of a fraud; which, if done animo furandi, is larceny. [POLLOCK, C.B.—Suppose the prisoner had seen a letter lying on a table, and had applied a lighted paper to it, would it have been larceny? There would have been no asportation then. [POLLOCK, C.B.—Then if burning it would not be a larceny, is the taking of it for the purpose of burning it a larceny? The question is, whether it is taken animo furandi; and whether a person can be said to convert a chattel to his own use by burning it, as he certainly may in some cases. The main argument on the other side is, that there is no evidence that the taking was lucri causid; but those words are not to be found in the original definition of larceny. (3 Inst. 107, citing the Mirror; Bracton, Lib. iii. c. 32, p. 159; 1 Hale, 503; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 33.) They are first introduced into the definition of larceny by Blackstone (4 Com. 229), who borrows them from the civil law; but at all events there is no authority for saying that the word lucrum means an advantage which can be measured by a pecuniary amount. In R. v. Cabbage (Russ. & Ry. 292), the advantage was prevention of evidence by destroying a horse, which clearly could not be measured by money. Here the object was to stop an inquiry into the prisoner's character, the reply to which would have been prejudicial to her. R. v. Morfit (Russ. & Ry. 307) is also, for the same reason, an authority in support of this conviction. In R. v. Richards (1 Car. & K. 529), Tindal, C. J. left it to the jury to say "whether the prisoner had put an iron axle into a furnace with a felonious intent to convert it to a purpose for his own profit; for, if he did so, it was a larceny;" although the iron would go back to the master's in another form; and the only advantage which the prisoner would get, would be id. for the extra weight drawn out of the furnace, according to the mode adopted of paying for the work. R. v. Godfrey (8 Car. & P. 563) is a very different case: it arose out of an election squabble; and all that the learned judge said was, that if a letter were opened out of idle curiosity, it would not be a felony.

Huddleston.—The definition in the Mirror contains the word "egregius," which is equivalent to the "lucrum" of the civil law. Lambard, in his "Elementary," gives a similar definition; and all the cases which have been cited shew that some advantage to be gained is one of the ingredients of larceny. Then here there is no evidence of any sort of advantage; and as to the property in the letter, the Act only provides that it may be laid in the Postmaster-General, to avoid the difficulty of laying it either in the sender or addressee; it does not in fact alter the property; for the Postmaster-General is only the locum tenens of the real owner. The last point, that, at all events, the Postmaster-General had parted with the property, and not merely with the possession of the letter, and that, therefore, the conduct of the prisoner was a false pretence, and not a larceny, has received no answer.

Cur. adv. vult.

The learned judges afterwards announced to consider the case, and held that the taking and destroying of the letter, under the circumstances stated, amounted to larceny; and that, therefore, the conviction was right.

Re Wm. HURNELL.

Assignments by traders.

A trader who assigns his property after service of writ will be deemed to have been guilty of fraudulent preference as against the creditor for whose debt such action was brought. It is his duty to file a declaration of insolvency.

The bankrupt had applied in August last for his certificate, but was opposed by Mr. Pain, on behalf of the creditors, on the ground that, after having been served with writs for various debts, he had assigned some property to his own foreman, and permitted his brother-in-law to take in execution all his other property. Judgment was deferred, but at the urgent request of the bankrupt it was this day given.

His Honour went very minutely into the facts of the case, stating that he should at all events have postponed the certificate for three years, because the bankrupt, after having been served with writs at the suit of creditors, had assigned his property in Leadenhall-street to his own foreman, and had permitted his brother-in-law to take in execution all his property in Windmill-street, and finally refused the certificate altogether, on the ground that the bankrupt had concealed about 150*l*. the proceeds of his furniture. His Honour added—I have often stated, and I shall continue to repeat it, until the public mind becomes familiar with the principle, that I shall always consider the date of the first writ served upon a person who afterwards becomes a bankrupt, without having paid the creditor who sued him, as the very latest period at which he must be deemed to have known that bankruptcy was approaching; and I shall always consider every act done, or omitted to be done by him after that date, tending directly or indirectly to the enabling of one or more of his creditors to get the bulk of his property, to the prejudice of the general body, as a serious act of commercial delinquency, to be punished by a postponement of the certificate, according to the circumstances of the case. It often happens that where property has been snatched from the general body of creditors by a seizure under execution, at the instance of one creditor, the bankrupt attempts to excuse himself on the ground that he could not prevent the seizure. I answer, that a trader can prevent such preference, by filing a declaration of insolvency, and it is his duty to do so. If he chooses not to perform that duty, he must be punished.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Wednesday, June 17.

(Before Sir F. POLLOCK, C.B.)

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. BAILEY.

Excise information—Illicit Distillery—License—Sale and use of spirits—Construction of 6 Geo. 4, c. 80, and 6 Geo. 4, c. 81.

A person distilling spirits for use on his own premises in the way of his trade, is equally liable to the duties and penalties imposed by the excise laws as if he distilled for sale.

This was an information at the suit of the Attorney-General against the defendant for penalties under the Excise Laws. The stat. 6 Geo. 4, c. 80, s. 26, enacts that if any person shall make or manufacture, deal in, retail, or sell any goods or commodities thereafter mentioned for the making, or manufacturing, or dealing in, retailing or selling of such goods or commodities, a license is required by the Act. Without taking out such license as is in that behalf required, he, she, or they shall, for every such offence, respectively forfeit and lose the respective penalty thereupon imposed as thereafter mentioned, that is to say, "Every distiller or maker of low wines or spirits, and every rectifier or compounder of spirits, so offending respectively, shall respectively forfeit and lose 500*l*." The stat. 6 Geo. 4, c. 80, s. 30, enacts, "That entry shall be made of the name and abode of the distiller and the place where the premises intended to be entered in, or shall be situate, and a true declaration given of the vessels and utensils erected and intended to be used therein." The 39th section then provides for the power to enter premises, and where any private or concealed still, back, or other vessel, for making worts or wash, or for making or distilling low wines and spirits, or any privately made spirits or low wines, or any wash or other materials preparing for distillation, are set up or kept, and to seize the same, and enacts "That, in case they shall not, within ten days next after such seizure, be claimed by the true and lawful owner thereof, then the said stills, backs, and other vessels, spirits, low wines, wash, and other material for distillation, shall be absolutely forfeited, and the premises of any such private or concealed still, back, or other vessel, or the person in whose custody the same shall be found, whether such seizure be claimed or not, shall forfeit and lose for every place in which such private still, back, or other vessel shall be so found, and also for every such still, back, and vessel found therein, the sum of 200*l*." The information contained counts applicable to these provisions, and in support thereof,

Sir F. Kelly, S.G. (Wilde with him), proved that on the 16th of July last certain excise officers repaired to the premises of the defendant, situate in Globe-road, Mile-end, where he professed to carry on the occupation of purifier of oils and manufacturer of size under the title of "Carter and Sims," and there discovered various vessels and utensils, all of which were used in the process of distillation, while, in various other vessels and vats, was a quantity of spirits in various stages of manufacture. One of the men, engaged by the defendant as his foreman, proved that spirits of nitre and ammonia had been continually manufactured on the premises, and that the plain spirit had also been made there, some of which had been supplied in large quantities to the defendant's customers.

At the close of the case for the Crown, which abundantly established the connection of the defendant with the premises and vessels in question, either as part or sole owner, Martin, Q.C. (with whom were Dowdeswell and Duncan), on behalf of the defendant, submitted that he was not liable to the penalties sought to be recovered in this information. He was prepared to shew to, and hoped to satisfy, the Chief Baron that the defendant had not in any degree infringed the statute 6 Geo. 4, c. 80 & 81, for that his distillery was quite legal. The statutes in which the information was grounded were meant to apply solely to distillers and makers of low wines and spirits for sale, and did not touch those who distilled wines and spirits on their own premises for the purpose of making some other manufacture in which they dealt. The witnesses for the Crown had admitted that the great bulk of the spirit manufactured at this place was used in the making of sal volatile and sweet spirits of nitre; and, on the true construction of these Acts, the defendant was prepared to shew that he was not liable to these penalties. This was done by many of the great wholesale chemists, and would be equally liable with the defendant.

Sir F. POLLOCK, C.B.—This is a subject which I have considered, and on which I have arrived long ago at a deliberate opinion. It would be waste of time, therefore, to enter upon any argument in support of the position taken by the defendant.

Martin hinted that his lordship would allow him to state the points on which the objection was founded.

Sir F. Kelly, S.G. apprehended that no doubt could exist on the subject; the 11th section of 6 Geo. 4, c. 80, was decisive; for it is there enacted, that "every person making or keeping any wash prepared or fit for distilling, or making low wines or spirits, or any low wines or ferments, and having in his, her, or their custody or use any still or stills, shall be deemed and taken to be, and is hereby declared to be, a distiller, liable to the several duties of excise, and to the several penalties, fines, and forfeitures imposed by this Act relating to distillers."

Sir F. POLLOCK, C.B.—There can be no question, as it appears to me, on the subject. It is impossible that I should have been so long engaged in considering these statutes as an advocate when opposing the Crown, and afterwards when, on two occasions, I held the office of Attorney-General, and recently, since I have occupied a seat on this bench, without arriving in my own mind at a conclusion satisfactory to myself, on this very subject, and I must say that I entertain no doubt whatever that the defendant is within these Acts, whether he makes spirits to sell, or whether he makes them to use in some other trade of his own. In either case he is a distiller, and as such is liable to the control of these statutes. The same thing had been done by an eminent blacking maker, who, being accustomed to use a quantity of vinegar in his trade, for which, when he bought it he had to pay a penny duty, thought he would save that duty by making vinegar on his own premises. He, however, was obliged to pay the duty on it as a distiller, and I cannot for a moment sanction any misconception in the mind of the public as to the state of the law on the subject, or rather of my opinion on that law. I entertain not the slightest hesitation in saying that the defendant is liable under these circumstances. It would be a monstrous thing to have it supposed in this country that a man could set up as a distiller on his own account, and so defraud the revenue of the duties chargeable on the materials used by him in his trade, and on which he would pay those duties if he had bought them. Such a state of things would be most dangerous, and the proposition was a most abused one, in my opinion. For this reason it was that I am unwilling to listen to any argument on the matter. At the same time I am ready, for I am bound to be so if the argument be pressed; but as I am willing to reserve the point for solemn discussion by the Court next Term, I think any argument now would be wasted, as I shall hold as I have expressed myself, and so direct the jury on the state of the law.

The learned Chief Baron then directed the jury in consonance with this opinion so expressed, and they found a verdict for the Crown.

(Before POLLOCK, C. B. and a Special Jury.)

BANKS v. GOODE.

Liabilities of Provisional Committees.—Advertising agents.

The question for the jury is, whether the consent to become a member of the committee was merely intended to express approval of the project, or was it intended to express, not only approval of the line, but willingness to incur the preliminary expenses? If the jury be of opinion that the purpose, in putting down the name, was only to express approval, and not to share the expenses, the person who did so with the former view is not liable for the payment of them.

The rule laid down by Parke, B. in Low v. Wilson, as to the non-liability of members of the Provisional Committee, where there is a Managing Committee, is correct.

Knowles and Wiles, for the plaintiff; and Crowder and Rawlinson, for the defendant.

This was an action to recover the sum of 560*l*. brought by the plaintiff, an advertising agent, against the defendant, a member of the provisional committee of the Salisbury and Lymington Junction Railway. The leading features in this case appeared to be, that the company had been projected in the month of September last by a gentleman at the bar of the name of H. J. Mellor, who had asked the firm of Weall and Berkeley to act as solicitors to the company, stating that the preliminary expenses would not be more than 50*l*. or 60*l*. A prospectus was accordingly prepared, printed, and issued, prior to which some advertisements announcing the company were inserted in the newspapers. Eventually the prospectus was published, as in the case of all other railways, in the morning and evening journals of London, and in some of the country papers. These insertions were, in the majority of instances, the result of the exertion of the plaintiff, and it was for the money paid for them that he now brought his action. Mr. Mellor, however, it appeared, had a co-promoter or projector in the person of a Mr. Brown, of Lymington, who was appointed what is denominated the "Local Agent." At first there was not any provisional committee published, but afterwards, when a few gentlemen had consented to act in that capacity, their names were put into the papers, and, as the list swelled in numbers, the alteration was made in the advertisements and prospectus by the addition of the new names. The defendant, in a conversation with Mr. Downes, expressed himself willing to become a member of the provisional committee; and, accordingly, in a few days a prospectus was sent to him, wherein his name was printed as a member of that committee. There was to have been a meeting of the committee on the 28th of October, but some of that body considering that it would be better to have a preliminary survey made prior to a meeting taking place, that event did not come to pass until the 7th of November. At this meeting Colonel Sloane acted as chairman, and the report of Mr. Braithwaite upon the survey was read. The orders for the advertisements were given oftentimes, if not upon most occasions, in the presence of several of the committee-men. At the period when the first advertisements were inserted, the company was composed of Mr. Mellor and his own firm (Weall and Berkeley). This was on the 26th of September, but in a few days afterwards they received several applications and offers of gentlemen to become members of the provisional committee. To most of the committee-men his firm gave a letter of indemnity against all liability for expenses, and his firm conceiving the course necessary by the Act of Parliament, had registered a copy of the circular containing the indemnity. This was done on the 16th of October. There was not any letter of indemnity sent to the defendant. At the time of Mr. Mellor asking his firm to act as solicitors to the company, he said the preliminary expenses would not be more than about 50*l*., and they accordingly undertook the concern, and paid all the preliminary expenses out of their own pockets, just as they should have done in the case of any other professional business. They gave an indemnity to Captain Rooke, but did not (as was understood) give one to Mr. Willis. The solicitors to the company were the attorneys for the plaintiff in the present case. The plaintiff had brought about twelve actions against as many different committeemen.

The LORD CHIEF BARON, in summing up, said that he should leave to the jury the same questions which he had left in the case of Reynell v. Lewis—namely, what was the effect of the defendant having consented to become a member of the provisional committee—which was a question entirely for the jury—and then whether that consent authorized any other person, the other members of the committee, the solicitors, or the secretary, to pledge the name of the defendant for the payment of certain reasonable and necessary expenses; and if so, then whether, in consequence of the appearance of certain names in the list of the committee, the plaintiff had been induced to take them as security for payment, and thereupon to furnish the outlay the reimbursement of which he now sought. This case presented topics for strong remarks, which remarks it was not his duty to withhold. This was one of those companies pretending to be a railway company which had never had any existence at all, and it appeared to him that the practice of getting provisional committees together by asking certain persons to consent to become as it were a few committeemen, to give a colour to the concern, was a system which was open to very strong observations. Now, he could not in any way understand how gentlemen could consent to become members of a provisional or any other committee under an indemnity from the persons who were, in truth, getting it up for the purpose of holding them out to the world as bond fide committeemen, when, at the same time, they were neither more nor less than, by that act, the mere instruments of the very solicitors by whose persuasion they had been induced to join the committee. When a number of persons were got together in these companies under the indemnity of the solicitors, he must confess that it appeared to him to be a delusion, not only upon the public and the world at large, but upon all other parties who might become connected with them, or with a company upon other and different terms. Mr. Downes had said that at the time he was speaking to the defendant upon the subject of the company he had shewn that gentleman his letter of indemnity. If that were so, it was somewhat odd if the defendant had not said that he should have no objection to become a committeeman upon the same terms. However that had been, the fact in either case could make no difference in so far as the plaintiff was concerned, if he was not aware of the existence of the indemnity; and that he was not had been proved by the fact of his having brought an action against Downes in the first instance. Now, although Downes had received this indemnity, he was liable to the plaintiff, and then his own remedy upon the indemnity was against the persons from whom he had received it—namely, Messrs. Weall and Berkeley. He must in the end have looked to the parties from whom he had received it—the solicitors of the company. If advertising in the public newspapers were part of the necessary expenditure for hatching the eggs of a railway company so as to give it life, and to make it fit to be brought into the world, and then to maintain it in life—who, let him ask, was to pay the expense of that advertising but the committee? or, were they merely an ornamental part of the concern? The question upon that part of the case then was, did the consent to become a member of the committee merely express the approval of the party so consenting of the project, or did it express not only his approval of the line, but his willingness to incur the preliminary expenses—not the expenses which the shareholders' money would be applied to when they supplied and poured in the capital for the construction of the railway, but the preliminary expenses? If, then, the jury were of opinion that the putting his name down as a committeeman had nothing to do with the preliminary expenses, in that case the person who did that in their view had nothing to do with the payment of them; but if they thought that at the time he had done so he had intended to share in the reasonable expenses of bringing out the company into full operation in the character of his initiated partnership as it were—this preliminary association—they would find a verdict against him. Now, the jury must consider what a man undertook when he became a member of a provisional committee. As far as a creditor was concerned, he had nothing to do with any private arrangement between the parties; all he had to do with was the prospectus. That was his guide in the matter. The case of Low v. Wilson, which had been mentioned as decided by his learned brother Parke, was different from this, inasmuch as in that case there had been a "managing" as well as a "provisional" committee, whilst here the former had not had any existence. As he had perused the report in the ordinary channel of public information his opinion had gone along with that expressed from the bench by his learned brother. But that case was quite different from the one now before the Court, because there there had been a committee of management, which was not the case here. Then, as to the next question for the consideration of the jury; when a man was once a member of a provisional committee, whether he was sent to by the company once or twenty times, it did not alter his position in the least. The letter of the 16th October, containing the prospectus, in which his name was published as a member of the committee, was evidence sufficient, even if there were no other, of his knowledge that his name had been published. But there was another fact to prove that knowledge. On the 28th of October the defendant was summoned to attend a meeting, when he wrote up to say that he would come up if the money was sent down to him to pay his expenses. The jury must consider whether the plaintiff would have been likely to have laid out upwards of 500*l.* in a matter of this sort for a speculating attorney, or whether he had not taken that step considering that the names of the committee were pledged as the security for his repayment. If the plaintiff had at that time known one half of what they all were aware of now in respect of railway companies, he was inclined to think that he would not have laid out one quarter of the sum he claimed. Even taking it for granted that Mr. Weall, the solicitor, had been surrounded by his indemnified satellites, still it had been proved that the plaintiff had received some of his orders from that gentleman when several of them were present, he receiving the orders under the impression that they were given him in the presence of bond fide committeemen. The jury, however, would take all the circumstances into consideration, and find in accordance with the opinion they might form thereon.

Verdict for the defendant.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Monday, June 22.

(Before Mr. Justice ERLE.)

Liabilities of Provisional Committee-men.

The solicitor to a projected Railway Company having ordered the insertion of various advertisements without the order of the committee, can the members of the committee be considered to have authorised their names to be pledged to the plaintiff for payment of such advertisements—quære?

In an action against a member of a provisional committee for debts incurred on behalf of the projected Company, it must be proved,

- 1st. That defendant had been a member of such committee at the time of the contracting of the debt.
- 2nd. That he had held himself out to the plaintiff as authorising the contraction thereof, and pledged his name to the plaintiff for the amount.
- 3rd. That defendant knew that the committee were incurring expenses on behalf of the projected railway upon his credit, and that he consented to have his name so used.
- 4th. That the expenses so incurred were reasonable and usual.

The plaintiff was an advertising agent. The action was brought to recover from the defendants, as members of the provisional committee of the Jamaica Southern, Eastern, and Northern Railway, the sum of 64*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* for advertising the scheme from the 9th to the 25th of September, 1845, in the Times and other newspapers.

G. Jones, Serjt. and Wordsworth for the plaintiff. Humphrey and Wiles, for the defendant.

The company in question was projected during the railway mania in August, 1845, the proposed capital being 1,500,000*l.* in 30,000 shares of 50*l.* and the names of both the defendants appeared in the prospectus as provisional committee-men.

The secretary to the proposed company and clerk in their offices, Mr. Orlando Aguilar, proved that defendant Blunt frequently attended at the office as a member of the provisional committee, and occasionally acted as chairman of the managing committee. He had also seen the other defendant attend at the company's offices on more than one occasion, and had shewn him a prospectus, with his name in it as a provisional committee-man; but he (Cornfoot) had never attended any meetings of the committee. Mr. Preston, the solicitor to the company, had ordered the insertion of the advertisements, and the newspapers containing them were each day laid on the office-table. In his cross-examination this witness stated that he and his brother, and two persons named Campbell and Stock, had started the company, and he and his brother, on the 25th of September proposed to give up their right as projectors of the company, for the sum of 15,000*l.* and 400 shares.

The attendance of Blunt, at two meetings of the provisional committee, was proved from the minute-book. There was nothing, however, in the minutes shewing any express authority from the committee to insert the advertisements.

A letter from Cornfoot of the 1st of December, was also read in answer to an application from the plaintiff, stating that he had retired from the company from the first meeting. There was no minute shewing that Cornfoot had ever attended any of the meetings. The amount of the debt was not disputed.

Mr. Justice ERLE, in summing up, said the first question was, aye or no, had the defendants authorised their names to be pledged to the plaintiff for the payment of the price of these advertisements? No express order had been proved, emanating from the provisional committee, and the only evidence to go to the jury was that the attorney to the company had given the order for the advertisements. This was very slight evidence. If the jury should be of opinion that the provisional committee had not in any way given authority for the insertion of their advertisements, then they must find for the defendants. Assuming, however, that such an authority had been given, it became then a question whether the defendants had both been members of the provisional committee either for a part or for the whole of the time, between the 9th and the 25th of September, and had held themselves out to the plaintiff as authorising the insertion of the advertisements. The jury must also determine whether both the defendants knew that the committee were incurring expenses on behalf of the projected railway on credit, and also whether the expenses that had been incurred were reasonable and usual. The defendants might have given their consent to their liability, not supposing that any large debts would be incurred. There was nothing in the prospectus to show that any such would be incurred, and up to the 25th of September there did not appear in the minute book a single resolution whereby the committee could be held liable for any debt. If the jury thought that Cornfoot might well have consented to have his name used, without reason to know what expenses would be incurred on his credit, they ought to find for the defendants. If they were of opinion in the affirmative, then they would consider whether the expenses incurred had been reasonable and usual; if so, they would find for the plaintiff.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount sought to be recovered, leave being reserved to the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit, on the ground that there was no sufficient evidence to maintain the action.

WONTNEE v. SHAPIER.

Right of allottees to recover back deposits.

Where a managing committee of a railway had advertised that all the shares were allotted, when in fact they had allotted only a small proportion of them, whereby the plaintiff was induced to pay deposits:—Held, that he might recover back the deposits so paid.

And even where defendant had executed the Parliamentary deed and subscribers' agreement under such a misstatement of the facts: held, that if the jury should be of opinion that he had executed such deed on the same understanding with which he had paid the money, such deed was void as against the plaintiff, and no bar to the action.

Knowles, Q. C. Byles, Serjt. and Joseph Brown, for the plaintiff.

The Solicitor-General, Doobing, Serjt. and Fitzherbert, for the defendant.

Knowles opened the case. The plaintiff is a solicitor, and the defendant a man of large property, residing in Sussex-gardens, Hyde-park, and chairman of the allotment committee of the "Direct London and Exeter Railway," for which object a company was formed on the 24th of May last year, and provisionally registered. The prospectus put forth by the company stated its object to be to form a direct line of railway from London to Exeter, with an extension line to Falmouth and Penzance; capital 3,000,000*l.* in 120,000 shares of 25*l.*; deposit 11*7s.* 6*d.* per share. Then followed the names of a number of noblemen and gentlemen of high respectability as directors and committee of management. The plaintiff applied for two allotments of shares of thirty each, and on the 15th of October last an allotment of the shares was made by the allotment committee, of which the defendant was chairman, and the defendant had allotted to him the shares for which he had applied. Two days afterwards, on the 15th, and subsequently on the 17th of October, advertisements were inserted in the Times newspaper as follows:—

"The Direct London and Exeter Railway.—The managing committee of this company hereby give notice, that the allotment of shares is completed, and that the letters will be issued to the public, if possible, this day."

"E. S. BLUNDELL, Honorary Secretary."

"October 13, 1845."

There was then a further advertisement, stating that the committee had no doubt of being able to comply with the standing orders, and announcing when a further "call" per share would be demanded. On the 17th of October the following advertisement was inserted in the Times:—

"The Direct London and Exeter Railway, with extension to Penzance.—The committee of management hereby give notice that they have completed the allotment of shares, and that the usual letters are this day issued. In the arduous duty of deciding on the claims, unprecedented, it is believed, in their number and respectability, the committee have been obliged to give a preference to applicants locally interested, or likely to bring to bear for the company a large share of legitimate influence. The numerous persons with undoubted claims on the score of wealth and social standing, whose applications have either been passed over or cut down, are requested to accept this reason as the committee's apology."

The plaintiff believing from this statement that a full and fair allotment of the shares announced in the prospectus had been made, paid his deposit of 82*l.* 10*s.* on the shares allotted to him on the 21st of October into the bank of Messrs. Currie and Co, the company's bankers, and subsequently, on the 4th of November, executed the parliamentary contract and subscribers' agreement, and received scrip signed by two directors, the defendant and a Mr. Spicer. The plaintiff heard nothing more of the company's affairs till the 15th of December, when a public meeting of the shareholders was called by advertisement at the London Tavern, at which Sir Bruce Chichester presided as chairman, when it appeared that instead of the whole 120,000 shares having been allotted, constituting the capital of the company, only 58,000 shares had been allotted, the committee having thus retained more than half the shares for their own use. At this time the shares were at a premium, and more than 400,000 shares had been applied for. At the meeting, which was rather a stormy one, a report and resolutions were agreed to, expressing the deep regret of the committee that only 58,000 shares had been allotted, which had injured the interests of the company, and, together with the panic, the consequence had been, that out of the 58,000 shares allotted, 35,460 then remained unpaid; and it was resolved, that the committee be authorized to issue shares to the extent required for the deposit in Parliament; if the amount were not subscribed, the whole sum to be returned to the subscribers without reduction. The deposits then paid up were 82,395*l.* out of which sum 4,344*l.* had been paid for parliamentary expenses, 14,050*l.* for engineering and surveying, 8,791*l.* for law expenses, 2,689*l.* for advertising; then there were various miscellaneous expenses, and "Dr. Blundell not accounted for, 512*l.* 10*s.*;" that gentleman, the honorary secretary, having left his post in debt to the company this amount, and taken with him the papers of the company. The total expenses amounted to upwards of 31,900*l.* leaving a balance in the hands of the company of 492*l.* The reading of this account gave great dissatisfaction to the meeting, and it appeared on inquiry that out of sixty-three provisional committeemen who had each agreed to take 150 shares, only nineteen had paid upon their shares. The plaintiff on that occasion moved an amendment to the effect, "that the committee had appropriated more than half the shares for their own benefit, and had procured the subscribers' money on the faith of an advertisement stating that a full and fair allotment had been made, and on this ground the whole of the deposits ought to be returned, and the committee ought to bear the expense." Great confusion took place, and the amendment was never put. A committee of management of three was appointed, who had since let the affairs of the company drop through, and they were unable to go before Parliament, and the scheme might be said to be virtually abandoned. The plaintiff, therefore, sought to recover the amount of deposit money which he had paid, first, on the ground of failure of consideration on the part of the projectors of the railway; secondly, on the ground of fraud; and third, because the directors had no right to incur expenses at the cost of the shareholders until the amount of the stipulated capital was subscribed.

The facts having been proved,

The Solicitor-General now submitted that the plaintiff must be nonsuited, on the ground that he had entered into his contract before the advertisement appeared, and before any imputation of fraud could exist; and, as a partner and shareholder in the company, he was entitled to a share of the effects, and to any benefit which might accrue to him as the holder of the scrip. He could not, therefore, be said to have paid his money without consideration, the company being still in existence, and he having authorized the trustees, by the partnership deed which he had signed, to go before Parliament next session for an act.

ERLE, J. said that the plaintiff's contract was, that he should have allotted to him a certain portion of 120,000 shares, which would produce a capital of 3,000,000*l.* to form a railway estimated to cost as much; that did not mean that he should have allotted to him a certain portion of 58,000*l.* and take his chance of the remaining shares being allotted to enable the performance of the contract. The case of Pitchford v. Davis, 5 Meesom and Welsby's Reports, decided it to be a breach of contract on the part of directors not to allot the number of shares, and raise the amount of capital proposed.

The Solicitor-General said the plaintiff's contract was not that the allotment should go for nothing, unless the whole number of shares were purchased. The contract was merely, that if so many shares were allotted to him, he would pay the deposit on each.

ERLE, J. thought the case ought to go to the jury. There was evidence which ought to be left to them whether the plaintiff had a right to recover back the money he had paid on a consideration tainted with fraud. The plaintiff paid the money on a consideration that 60 shares were allotted to him as parcel of 120,000 shares; and it seemed to him (Erie, J.) material that every person should understand how many shares were allotted, in order that he might know how many coadjutors he had in the undertaking, and how far the requisite capital was subscribed.

The Solicitor-General then addressed the jury at great length for the defendant.—It was unfortunate that, owing to the misconduct of Dr. Blundell, and to the panic, the undertaking had not proceeded as was anticipated, supported as it was by many names of respectability. If the law were as laid down in Pitchford v. Davis, it was high time that it should be altered; and if this case were determined on that authority, it would be necessary to resort to the Court of the last resort. He should humbly ask the learned judge to lay down the law on the subject, in order that if he differed from him the point might be satisfactorily settled. He contended that the advertisement did no damage to the plaintiff, for the less the number of shares in the market, the more valuable they would be, and if he intended to sell his shares he would get the greater profit, if not it would have no effect.

He called Mr. White, who proved the execution of the Parliamentary contract by the plaintiff, and put in copies of the deeds, which were taken as read, and which authorized the trustees and directors to proceed to Parliament to obtain a bill next session.

Knowles, Q.C. having replied,

ERIE, J. in summing up, said, there were two grounds on which the plaintiff claimed a verdict. First, the fact that Wontner had contracted for sixty shares, parcel of 120,000, and that the statement that all these shares had been allotted, was a material inducement to him to pay his deposit. If the jury were of that opinion, they ought to find their verdict for him on this ground:—Was the advertisement false to the knowledge of the defendant? If they thought it was, and that it was a material inducement to the plaintiff to pay his deposit, and that he would not have paid it had he known the real facts, they would find for the plaintiff. Secondly, did they think that this scheme was an abortive scheme, and at an end? If they thought so, on this ground also they must find for the plaintiff; for it had been determined in the Court of Exchequer that, if a party paid a deposit on an abortive scheme, he had a right to recover back his deposit. And they would also say whether the deed was executed by the plaintiff on the same understanding with which he had paid the money.

The jury, after a short consultation, found a verdict for the plaintiff on both grounds. Damages, 82l. 10s.; and that the plaintiff executed the deed with the same understanding as he had paid the money.

THE LEGISLATOR.

Summary.

THE measure of the Session has become law, and with its birth expires the Government. Of course, in such circumstances, nothing more will be done than necessity compels. No projects of law will proceed beyond their present emergency. The business bills will be rapidly carried through their various stages, and then the Parliament will be prorogued, to give the new Government time to prepare their measures. All the threatened changes in the law may, we presume, be deemed as deferred, if not destroyed, unless the impatience of the landlords should induce the hurrying of the Conveyancing Bill into a law, amid the mob of bills that mark the close of a Session. By the bye, this curious measure has been almost doubled in length in its passage through the committee, by the addition of short forms, applicable to various other kinds of conveyances. The Friendly Societies Bill has been so changed both by Lords and Commons, that scarcely an original feature remains. It is, however, very much improved, and mainly through the instrumentality of Mr. NEISON, who pointed out to the government some radical defects in the measure, as originally framed, and his suggestions were at once adopted.

Bills in Progress.

CHURCHES.—The following is an outline of the Bill to provide for the erection and repair of Churches in consolidated ecclesiastical districts (just introduced into the House of Commons by Mr. R. Hodgson and Mr. H. Elphinstone). The preamble recites the several Acts for building additional Churches, from 58 Geo. 3, c. 45, to 8 and 9 Viet. c. 70; and then proceeds to enact, "That it is expedient to provide for the erection and repair of Churches and Chapels in consolidated ecclesiastical districts; and that consolidated ecclesiastical districts be considered distinct parishes." Churchwardens or other officers are to be appointed for new parishes.

Clause 3 relates to the rate for building new churches:—"That it shall be lawful for the rate-payers in any such new separate parish (provided always that the consent in writing of the ordinary shall be first duly obtained), to make a rate for the building of a new church, or for the repairing or for the enlarging any church or chapel now existing, for the use of the inhabitants of such new separate parish: provided always that no such rate shall be valid unless rate-payers occupying at the least three-fourths of the property rated to the relief of the poor in such new separate parish concur in the making such rate; and no such rate shall be valid unless due notice be given of the intention to make such rate for such purpose, by an advertisement published during three successive weeks, in some one newspaper published in the county or counties wherein such parish is situated, signed by the churchwardens, overseers, and ten rate-payers, or where there shall be fewer than ten rate-payers, by rate-payers to the amount of one-fourth of the rates levied for the relief of the poor.

Clause 4 declares that churchwardens may raise money for building new churches by mortgage—provided always, that it shall be covenanted that not less than one-tenth of the sum so borrowed shall be annually paid off, in addition to the interest agreed to be paid for such sum.

Clause 5. Providing sites for New Churches.—That it shall be lawful to erect any such new church or chapel on any glebe land on any part of such new separate parish; and it shall be lawful to take any quantity of such glebe land, not exceeding in the whole two acres, for the purpose of forming a churchyard for the burial of the dead; and the glebe land so taken for the site of such new church, and for such churchyard, shall thereafter be vested in the ordinary for the use of such separate parish; provided always, that such glebe lands shall not be taken unless the ordinary and the clerk in holy orders who may be in the possession of the glebe land shall give their consent thereto in writing.

Clause 6 provides that funds now applicable to repairs of churches may in certain cases be applied for the purposes of this Act.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PAUPER LUNATICS ACT.

TUESDAY, June 23.—Sir J. TROLLOPE wished to repeat a question which he had already put to the right hon. gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. It was, whether it was the intention of her Majesty's government to amend the Pauper Lunatics Act during the present session, as regarded the discretion allowed to magistrates in case of applications for the relief of lunatic paupers being made to them.—Sir J. GRAHAM said that in consequence of a doubt that existed, whether it was mandatory or not on magistrates to send pauper lunatics to work-houses, the question was submitted to the law officers of the Crown, who decided that it was mandatory. It was then the intention of the Government to make an alteration in that respect this session.

REGISTRAR OF THE NEW SOUTH WALES COURT.

Mr. HUME begged to ask some of the members of her Majesty's Government, whether any further information had been received from New South Wales, respecting the defalcation of Mr. Manning, the registrar of the court there, and whether the Government had taken any means to repay the creditors on the funds in that court.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER was understood to say that proceedings had been instituted against the sureties of Mr. Manning, and that the amount of their bonds, which had been recovered, would be applied in liquidation of the creditors' claims.

GENERAL RECORD OFFICE.

Mr. C. BULLER, according to notice, moved that a select committee should be appointed to consider the best means of providing a General Record Office for England and Wales. The resolution was not opposed, but a discussion took place on the propriety of submitting to the same committee the consideration of the best means to be adopted for recording the works of the ancient historians of this country. This discussion was entered into by Mr. W. Wynne, Mr. Hume, Mr. Protheroe, Mr. Christie, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, after which the original motion was carried.

THE MAGISTRATE.

Summary.

THE Poor Removal Bill, now converted into a Settlement Bill, seems to be slumbering. There is, however, no chance of its becoming law during the present session, unless the new Government should feel itself bound to forward the remaining portions of the scheme of its predecessors, of which the Corn Bill and Tariff were only a part. Fortunately, these questions of settlement, and so forth, are not subjects of party conflict.

EMPLOYMENT OF CONVICTS LEAVING GAOL.—Mr. Benjamin Colchester, of Ipswich, has just published the following suggestion on this important subject:—"I propose that a company shall be formed, and a farm taken to the extent of two or three hundred acres, say 150 acres to begin with, which would cost 1,500*l.* to carry through the first year, which may be raised by 100 shares of 15*l.* each, or 15 shares of 100*l.* each. I prefer the former, as more persons would be interested in it. A careful tenant should have the farm, and take the risk of profit and loss, if desirable, or let it remain the property of the company. If sufficient men and boys are ready to leave the goal, the whole work should be done by them; and perhaps there would be no better plan to begin with than to furnish each person with a suitable dress, and a change of under clothing, should they feel disposed to accept of the offer; but let it be perfectly understood that it shall be entirely at the option of the convict to come or not; but if he do come, to conform strictly to all the rules. Lodging they must find for themselves, boarding at the farm; for breakfast good bread and cheese, and then, at the usual time, a good hot meat dinner, and for supper bread and cheese: at first 1*s.* per week by way of wages, to increase at the master's pleasure, under the superintendence of the subscribers or not; possibly it may be most advisable to give the master entire control. If any desire to board themselves, let them have wages according to their work, the same as other labourers.

The farm to be cultivated in the best possible manner, and all the work done as well as they can be taught to do it. Certain rules would be required as the affair progressed."

THE LAWYER.

Summary.

We write, on Friday, when changes are only expected, not accomplished. But the prospect has absorbed all other subjects during the week, and speculation is afloat as to the fortunate men who are to fill the law offices. There can be no doubt about the Chancellor or the Attorney-General. Lord COTTENHAM has unquestioned claims to the one, Sir THOMAS WILDE to the other. But beyond these all is conjecture.

COUNTY OF CLACKMANNAN.—P. Anstruther, esq.; P. Haig, esq. to be Deputy Lieutenants.

Mr. David Pollock (elder brother of the Chief Baron of the Exchequer,) has just received the appointment of Chief Justice of Bombay, the salary of which is 8,000*l.* per annum. Mr. Pollock is now on circuit discharging the duties of commissioner of the Insolvent Debtors' Court, which office he has enjoyed for about two years, having received that appointment on the death of the late Mr. Commissioner Bowen. The salary of the commissioners of the Insolvent Court is 1,500*l.* a year. Mr. Cooke, the eminent barrister, practising in the Bankrupt and Insolvent Courts, is generally expected to fill the vacancy caused by the removal of Mr. Pollock.

THE NEW COMMISSIONERS OF THE INSOLVENT COURT.—The rumour of the appointment of Mr. Cooke, the barrister, as the new Commissioner of the Insolvent Court (vacant by the removal of Mr. Commissioner Pollock to the Chief Justiceship of Bombay) is without foundation. Mr. Charles Phillips, a commissioner of the Liverpool District Court of Bankruptcy, has received the appointment. The learned commissioner, by accepting the situation, will lose 300*l.* a year, his present salary as a country commissioner in bankruptcy being 1,800*l.* per annum, but it is said he has been influenced mainly by considerations of health. The vacancy thus created in the court at Liverpool will be filled, it is understood, by Mr. Henry James Perry, the Lord Chancellor's secretary.—Globe.

THE UNDER-SHERIFFALTY.—Mr. Baylis, of the firm of Baylis and Drewe, of Basinghall-street, has been appointed under-sheriff to Alderman Challis, and Mr. Kennard's under-sheriff will be Mr. Tilleard, of the firm of Tilleard, Sons, and Freeman, Old Jewry.

LEGAL INTELLIGENCE.

RAILWAY LIABILITIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE DAILY NEWS.

SIR,—The following copy of the opinion of a Queen's counsel, just taken, on some points arising out of the transactions of a railway company which has withdrawn its bill, will, I am disposed to think, be acceptable to a large body of your readers. The questions are so shaped as to render the statement of the case unnecessary.

A CHANCERY SOLICITOR.

Gray's Inn, June 23.

Question 1. Are the original subscribers, who have lately sold their scrip, still liable to unsatisfied creditors?—Answer. They are.—Question 2. Are they liable for such further calls as may be made?—Answer. This depends upon whether the directors and other subscribers have accepted the purchasers in their place, and so released them.—Question 3. Will the Court of Chancery compel the purchasers to indemnify the sellers against their liability to creditors and for calls?—Answer. It will not, unless there were special agreements to that effect.—Question 4. The Joint Stock Company Regulation Act of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, s. 26, prohibiting the sale of shares before complete registration, are not sales, the company being only provisionally registered, illegal? If not, are not such sales illegal upon other grounds?—Answer. It has been determined that the above section does not apply to railway companies. The circumstance, therefore, of the company being only provisionally registered is immaterial. The sale of railway scrip does not appear to be illegal, notwithstanding there are some dicta in the books not favourable to such a transaction. But though the sale be not illegal, yet it will be seen from my answers to the other questions that the result of it is different from what probably most original subscribers have anticipated. A sale of railway scrip in the way usual in the city, merely creates the relation of trustee and cestui que trust between the original subscriber and the purchaser, and by no means relieves the former from responsibility as regards other persons.

[We omit the signature; but it is that of a distinguished counsel.—Ed. D. N.]

A STRANGE PROVISION.—It has lately been decided by the Court of Amsterdam, that the law which obliges the State to provide for the seventh child in any family where the first six are living, is still in vigour; in consequence of which the State was condemned to pay to a man named Hoogland 250 florins per annum (21l.), till his seventh child shall have reached the age of 18, or to provide for it till that time. This sentence was confirmed by the Court Royal of La Hague.

VENTILATION AND DR. REID.—At the Central Criminal Court this week rather a singular scene occurred. The Recorder in the course of the day complained of the great heat in the Court. He said the thermometer stood at 70, and he should be very glad to have a little fresh air. He was informed that, by Dr. Reid's new ventilating process, all the windows of the court were nailed down, so that it was hopeless to expect any supply of fresh air from that quarter. In a short time some explosions appeared to take place in the neighbourhood of the court, and the proceedings were interrupted by repeated bang, bang, bangs. The Recorder inquired what the guns were firing for? Mr. Straight said that the reports which had attracted the attention of the Court did not proceed from guns, but were occasioned by some new experiment by Dr. Reid to ventilate the court. Mr. Ballantine said he hoped they should not all be blown up by some of the doctor's experiments. The business then proceeded, and in a little while the explosions ceased, but the court remained as hot as ever.

METROPOLITAN BUILDINGS ACT.—On Wednesday, the 1st of July, the 53rd section of the Metropolitan Buildings Act (7 & 8 Victoria, c. 84) will take effect. The object of this provision is to improve the sanitary condition of the poor with respect to close, undrained, and unventilated rooms, which are not to be used as dwellings after the 1st proximo. It is declared by the section that from and after the day mentioned it shall not be lawful to let separately to hire as a dwelling any such room or cellar not constructed according to the rules specified in schedule "K," nor to suffer it to be occupied as such, nor to let, hire, occupy, or suffer to be occupied any such room or cellar built underground for any purpose (except for a ware-room or store-room); and that if any person wilfully let or suffer to be occupied in manner aforesaid any underground cellar or room contrary to the provisions of the Act, then, on conviction thereof before two justices of the peace, such person shall be liable to forfeit for every day during which such cellar or room shall be so occupied a sum not exceeding 20s. and one-half of such penalty shall go to the person who shall sue for the same, and the other half to the poor of the parish in which such unlawfully occupied cellar or room shall be situate. In reference to lowermost rooms, it is provided by the schedule that if a room or cellar be used as a separate dwelling, the floor must not be below the surface or level of the ground immediately adjoining thereto, unless it have an area, fire-place, and window, and unless it be properly drained, with a window fitted with glazed sashes to open for ventilation.

EQUITY ARREARS, JUNE 22.—It appears that the business before four of the Equity Courts, upon the resumption of the Trinity sittings after Term this day, is of a comparatively moderate character. Those causes which have stood over many successive terms are appeals before the Lord Chancellor, of which there are, in his lordship's list, 42; this, however, is under the usual average. The Vice-Chancellor of England's list, including entries up to Saturday, shews a total of 116. The number before Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce is 64; this shews an increase upon the number usually upon his Honour's register at the commencement of Term sittings after. Vice-Chancellor Wigram's list gives a total of 98 causes, of which number 67 have just been transferred from the list of the Vice-Chancellor of England, commencing with Ford v. Wastell, and ending with Oyle v. Hansard. Thus the total is 320.

PROVISIONAL AND MANAGING COMMITTEEMEN.—A correspondent, whose signature is "L. R.," illustrates with much acuteness the distinction between these two characters. "No case of provisional committee-men's liabilities appears to me to have been correctly stated hitherto, because due regard has not been paid to the distinction between the duties and the responsibilities of the member of a provisional and the member of a managing committee. After a company is formed, the managing committee placed in power, the solicitor and banker appointed, the functions of the provisional committee cease, the new one entirely superseding it. The members of the provisional committee not nominated on the managing committee have no power, and no knowledge but what is common to everybody. The acting or managing committee allot the shares and conduct themselves towards members of the provisional committee not of their own number exactly as towards other persons. These provisional committee-men, by taking shares, only incur the liabilities of other simple shareholders. Those of them who by letter decline to take up their shares, cease to have any connection with the company. To hold a provisional committee-man, who has been denuded, or who has denuded himself of all power, liable for all the actions of the managing committee for months and years, is monstrous. To maintain that a provisional is a permanent committee is as absurd as to talk of a 'permanent preparatory measure.' The power, and with it the responsibility, of the provisional committee-men ceases the moment the company is formed."

—Daily News.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES BILL.—The amendments made by the Lords in this bill, as sent up by the House of Commons and now returned, have since been printed. Four additional clauses have been added by their lordships, and various amendments made in the clauses which appeared in the bill as it passed the House of Commons. The bill has been completely changed since its introduction to the House of Commons. It was altered in committee, again altered, and altered by the House of Lords. The substance of the new clauses is to enable members to withdraw from societies on written notice; to require returns from societies to the registrars; and to adopt the forms set forth in the bill. The new measure is to be construed with and as part of the Friendly Societies Acts of the 10th George IV. and of the 5th William IV.

A Memorial to the Lord Chancellor is in the course of signature at Nottingham, praying that a new district, to be called the Birmingham East district, might be formed, comprising the town of Nottingham, the city of Lincoln, and the counties of Nottingham, Leicester, and Lincoln, for which new district one of the Commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy, now held at Birmingham, could hold the Court at Nottingham, as the centre of such district. The number of bankruptcies which have occurred in the said counties of Nottingham, Leicester, and Lincoln, since November, 1842, up to the 1st of April, 1846, are 101, being forty-three from Nottingham, and twenty-four from Leicestershire, and fifty-four from Lincolnshire; and during the same period also about 80 insolvent cases from the said counties and towns; and by the above alteration, the cases from such three counties would be heard at Nottingham; and the five counties of Warwick, Worcester, Hereford, Salop, and Stafford, and the southern division of Derbyshire, would still continue at Birmingham.

DECREASE OF CRIME.—A gratifying decrease of crime may be noticed during the last year or two in Leicestershire. In May last, there were but fourteen commitments to the castle, and the majority of these cases were minor offences, there being but three of felony. Since the 1st of June, there have been but nine commitments, and of these but four for felony. In January, 1844, at which time the construction of railways opened so wide a field for labour in this and the adjoining counties, there were but fifteen commitments, a number far below any in the corresponding months for ten years. For the sessions next week, there is not even a single case, nor is there at present a female prisoner in the castle. All this tells of an improvement in the labour market, and in the habits and morals of the population.

MALT.—Reports to her Majesty's Government, relative to the feeding of cattle with malt. The reports comprise—1. Questions addressed to, and letters in reply from, Dr. Thompson, Dr. Lyon Playfair, and Mr. Graham on the subject. 2. A summary of experiments on the relative value of barley and malt on the milk of cows, used as food. 3. The relative value of grass, barley, malt, molasses, linseed, and bean-meal, when used as food for cows. 4. The relative value of barley and malt, when employed in fattening bullocks.—The result of a multitude of experiments, whose details are given, appears to be that malt is considerably inferior to barley, both in the production of milk and in fattening the animal. This conclusion coincides with that drawn from the chemical analysis of the two substances, since barley when malted loses nearly one-fifth of its weight, and contains a less proportion of azote, an element which is indispensable either for the support of the animal, or the production of milk.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CONVEYANCING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Being concerned for some purchasers of very small pieces of land, for which, as they purchase for accommodation, they have to pay a very high price, I am consequently desirous of rendering the expenses of the conveyances as light as may be. The circumstances of the title render long recitals necessary, and it struck me that Lord Brougham's miniature conveyance would be applicable to the case; but I hesitate to use it, because I am not clear, whether a progressive stamp duty would not be payable, notwithstanding the conveyance, under Lord Brougham's Act, might not contain more than 2,160 words. That Act renders a conveyance under it chargeable with the same stamp duty as if it had been a release founded on a lease for a year; and with the same stamp duty with which such lease for a year would have been chargeable. Therefore, as the lease for a year is abolished, and the stamp duty retained, it strikes me that the stamp duty was meant to be retained also on the long forms of column two, though the short forms of column one only are actually inserted in the conveyance. Perhaps some of your readers will enlighten me on this point.

Is our Law Institution defunct? The Society for the Amendment of the Law are active, and seem determined to deal out reform with no sparing hand; but I hear of no corresponding activity on the part of any of our law societies. All professional men, I believe, concur in the opinion that reform is requisite, and all I think are ready to assist in promoting sound and judicious measures to effect that object; but the public should not be permitted to impute our acquiescence to drowsiness or inability to protect our own interests. The curtailment of our profits by conveyancing reform is a fair ground upon which to claim a curtailment of our expenses, by a repeal of the certificate duty; and in order to protect what conveyancing practice may be left to us, from the inroads of unprofessional dabblers in that science, we may fairly ask for some legislative enactment. Such, for instance, as rendering it essential that every conveyancer should either be a member of one of the Inns of Court, or have served five years under articles, and be admitted to one of the courts, having been previously examined; and it would be a great protection, if it was enacted, that every practitioner should affix to every conveyance which he prepared a seal (similar to that used for notarial purposes), and himself sign a certificate on the conveyance, that it was prepared by himself, or some other duly qualified practitioner; rendering any party imitating such seal, or illegally using any, subject to an indictment for forgery, and subjecting to a heavy penalty any practitioner who should permit an unqualified person to use his seal, or append his name to any conveyance; or who should himself attach his seal or certificate to any conveyance prepared by an unqualified person.

I am, Sir, &c.

June 22, 1846.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—I quite concur in the feeling of disapprobation which you express in respect to the course pursued by some of the Profession of suing out separate writs against numerous parties for the same debt, but I entertain some doubt as to the propriety of the plan which you recommend the defendants to adopt.

In the case you put of all the forty actions proceeding pari passu, and all being set down for trial, it is true they could not all be heard at the same instant, and no doubt, as soon as judgment was obtained in one action, that judgment might be pleaded in bar to such of the other actions as might be then pending; but I apprehend the plaintiffs, merely obtaining a verdict in one action, would afford the defendants no ground of defence to the others: and if the cause were tried in town at the sittings after Term, or in the country at the Assizes, the plaintiff, although he obtained a verdict, could not have judgment until the 5th day of the ensuing Term, and he might delay the signing his judgment to even a later period, whilst, in the meantime, all the other actions might be tried and verdicts for the plaintiff obtained; and, after verdicts, I conceive the defendants could not avail themselves of any judgment which might be obtained against any other defendant.

I would submit, therefore, that instead of pleading, one of the defendants should suffer judgment by default, when such judgment might, I apprehend (at least if the action were brought in debt, as I believe the majority of them are) be pleaded in bar to the other actions.

I am, Sir, &c.

WM. THORNE.

Wolverhampton, June 25, 1846.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Great complaints, it appears, still continue to be made on the subject of the unequal distribution of business amongst the three courts of Common Law. To the threatened plan of throwing open the Court of Common Pleas, by Parliamentary interference, as one of the means of lessening the amount of the evil, you have already urged, as a strong objection, that such a course would increase another existing evil; viz. the difficulty at present experienced of securing the attendance of leading counsel, who would then have three instead of two courts to attend to. Might not the amount of business in the courts be nearly equalised, and the danger of entrusting a case to junior counsel, at the same time, be diminished, by some such plan as the following?

In all cases (where the courts have concurrent jurisdiction), in which the venue is intended to be laid in London or Middlesex, if the plaintiff's (or first plaintiff's) name begins with any letter from A to K, let the action be brought in the Common Pleas; if with any letter from L to Z, in the Exchequer; and with respect to country causes, let certain circuits be appropriated to each of the three courts. By this means, something like an equality of business might be attained; and by giving none of the London or Middlesex causes to the Queen's Bench, that court would be able to get through its own peculiar business.

No difficulty, I apprehend, would attend the adoption of such a plan as this, except, perhaps, in cases of change of venue. Some arrangement, however, might be made to meet this: for instance, it might be ordered by rule of all the courts, or by Act of Parliament, if necessary, that the cause shall remain in the court out of which the writ of summons issued, until after issue joined, and afterwards be transferred to the court to which it would have originally belonged, had the venue been in the first instance laid in the county to which it shall have been ultimately changed.

I am, Sir, &c.

SELECTIONS FROM CORRESPONDENCE.

Esor replies to two queries in our last.

First, as to "Small Agency Charges."—If your Preston correspondent could ascertain (which he soon may) if the large town in Yorkshire "rejoices" in a local court for the recovery of small debts, which most of the large towns do; then, I think, he cannot have much difficulty in obtaining payment of his agency account. I say nothing of the expense attending it. But, there is quite as much cause of complaint by country Solicitors against their correspondents (casual, I mean) in London, and other large towns, of non-payment, or most dreadfully long "deferred" payment of such country agent's charges for service of writs and other proceedings; and I feel sorry to have to add, that the charge attaches as much to the "great" as the smaller offices.

Then as to "Reforms in Conveyancing."—Many of your readers appear quite astounded at reading the extracts of evidence given by Mr. Baxter before the Lords' Committee on "Land Burdens," and cannot believe that gentleman is a solicitor. But such is the fact; and also eminent in his profession. He resides in a most respectable town in Yorkshire, and enjoys an extensive practice, and should, therefore, know something of the expenses attending conveyancing. I can well see the object of his having been called on to give evidence, as he is, or was, solicitor to the Great Yorkshire "Agricultural Protection" Society. But I consider Mr. B. is too good "a friend" to the profession to do any thing to injure his "less successful" competitors, and that his evidence was mainly directed to obtain a revision of the stamp duties on conveyances and mortgages, &c. which he knows, as well as any one, tend so much to injure the best branch of business of the country solicitor.

I am sorry I cannot concur with another contributor, "Puck," in his remarks that the Law Institution is the proper body to stand forward to protect the interest of our branch of the profession. I really am at a loss to discover of what utility that body has been to the Profession, beyond its periodical examination of article clerks; but to expect from the Law Institution the preparation of a scale of charges in conveyancing that would be allowed, or submitted to, both in town and country, is quite hopeless! It is your high "fixed" scale, which obtains in London and other large towns, that causes all the noise and hubbub against the Profession; and yet a new practitioner cannot depart from it without great risk of losing caste amongst the most respectable of his brethren; and if he urges to his clients that his charges are according to the fixed legal scale, as allowed on taxation, he would soon find his clients go to others who had a more easy sliding scale of their own.

In short, it is come to this, that as the solicitor is liable for negligence in the conduct of his business, and the client has a remedy also by taxation, why not let each solicitor charge according to his own notion of the trouble and anxiety attending the business done (that is, within the present well-understood scale of charges); in other words, if A chooses to rest satisfied with 3s. 4d. where B would probably charge 6s. 8d. why should the latter, or his brethren of older standing, complain? Let this be done; let the certificate duty be repealed, and some enactment passed, that none but duly admitted and practising solicitors should prepare deeds and other legal documents, and you would then not have such an infliction and inroad of petty agents, accountants, brokers, &c. et id omne genus, to the injury of the maligned and hard-worked legal practitioner.

E. A. B. thus answers a query in our last as to non-payment by London solicitors:—

The best plan for a "Country Subscriber" to adopt for the future will be, to employ Mr. Laidman, of 119, Chancery-lane, or some other respectable party, who makes it his business to receive small sums from the London solicitors for such services as your correspondent speaks of, performed by solicitors in the country.

SATURDAY, JUNE 27, 1846.

LOCAL COURTS.

ANOTHER Bill for the establishment of Local Courts is before Parliament. It is not likely to be more successful than its predecessors. Introduced at the close of a Session, by a Government in extremis, it is difficult to assign a motive for the movement, unless it is an excuse for staying the progress of the numerous Small Debts Bills that were marching through the Legislature. If this were indeed its purpose, it is one much to be commended, though the machinery be somewhat ponderous for so insignificant an object. We look upon the system of private speculation in Courts of Justice as an unmitigated mischief. A few individuals, having an eye to offices in it, get up a Local Court, and obtain the sanction of Parliament to a measure vesting in them the powers and prerogatives of a Court of Justice—often extending to jurisdiction over the liberties, always over the properties, of the people. Verily it justifies the character given to us by foreigners of being in all things a trading people. We have proprietary churches—proprietary schools—and last, most strange of all, speculative Courts of Justice! Undoubtedly, if there be need of more tribunals, they should be established systematically, by the State, under the control of the State, and their proceedings regulated by the State; and, so far as the new Local Courts Bill is intended to be a substitute for the many projected private Courts, it is a timely and necessary measure. We do not now, and never have we denied that greater facilities are required for the recovery of small debts and the settlement of small disputes. We have always advocated more speedy trial and less costs. We have contended that, so far as it is possible, justice should, to use the favourite phrase, be brought home to men's doors, and that they should not be compelled to take long journeys to seek it. But while cordially concurring in the principle, and anxious to see it carried into practice, we have been obliged to oppose every measure yet produced with the proclaimed purpose of putting these principles into operation. And wherefore? Because they failed to accomplish their design. Because they were not wisely adapted to their end. Because they were manifestly framed by men of the study, not by men of the world. Because practical experience had not presided at the councils of their authors, and we were assured that they would produce vastly more of mischief than they would remove. Nor does the present measure better recommend itself to the practical judgment than either of its predecessors. We have not been able, as yet, to do more than glance at it hastily; but the radical defects of all the other projects are apparent in this new one. It extends the jurisdiction of the Local Courts to the sum of 20*l.*, a sum too great to be intrusted to such a tribunal. To law-makers, 20*l.* may appear insignificant; but to the class of suitors by whom the courts will be frequented, the result of a wrong judgment would be ruinous. When it is remembered, that the measure aims at excluding altogether the interference of professional men, by making the fees so trifling that no respectable attorney could sell his time and education so cheaply; that parties will have to conduct their own cases there, amid the proverbial disadvantages of being their own clients. When to these are added the further evil resulting from the brood of harpies, in the shape of sham lawyers, sure to be engendered by cheap courts from which real lawyers are excluded; and the tricks to which the unprotected suitor will be exposed from his unscrupulous opponents, the sum of 20*l.* is much too large to be subjected to such a jurisdiction.

Over and over again we have said, and we repeat it now, that the only practically efficient method of complying with the demand for cheap and speedy justice is the remodelling of the existing Courts of Quarter Sessions. There is the machinery already provided, and which, at a very trifling cost, may be adapted to all the exigencies of the occasion. A paid chairman and a jurisdiction enlarged to all actions under 20*l.* unless a judge in chambers shall otherwise appoint, on application by either party shewing good reason for a hearing by a higher tribunal, would give to the public all the benefits, without any of the evils, of the proposed Local Courts. To make them still more efficient, they might be empowered to hold intermediate sessions in different parts of the county. An appeal might be allowed to the superior courts.

Nor would the services of the revived Courts of Quarter Sessions end here. A great saving of expense might be made by adopting the Irish mode of registration, and devoting one day in each session to the registration, the paid chairman performing the duties of revising-barrister, and admitting new claimants, or hearing objections to those already registered. A plan might be readily devised for securing fairness in both, by requiring the claim or notice of objection to be lodged at the sessions preceding the hearing, so that all parties interested may have ample time to prepare, and the safeguard of costs might, as now, be thrown around both claimants and objectors. Thus would be swept away all the costly machinery of the annual registration, for the register would be always in process of formation. A man having once established his claim, would remain there until formally objected to and, after a hearing, expunged.

There are many other functions which well-regulated Courts of Quarter Sessions might discharge, and which will readily suggest themselves to the reader.

We trust that before the Local Courts Bill shall, in another session, be urged forward with serious intent to pass it into a law, the Profession will feel the necessity of a little more union and energy in self-defence than they have hitherto exhibited, and that they will exert their great influence, not in a mere dogged opposition to any change, but to procure such alterations only as will really prove beneficial. And we trust that this subject of Local Courts especially will engage the attention of the Society for the Amendment of the Law, with purpose to ascertain whether the modification of the Quarter Sessions Courts, somewhat after the manner we have ventured to suggest, would not be more efficient than the establishment of the new Courts contemplated by the various measures hitherto framed. If the Society will take up the question earnestly, and look at it practically, we are confident they would come to that conclusion, and what they recommend will, without difficulty, be adopted by any government, only too happy to be relieved from the task of Law Reform by a body in whom they have confidence, as not only willing to work, but peculiarly competent.

It is to be earnestly hoped, moreover, that into the next Parliament the Lawyers will take care to put a representative of their own, to speak their opinions and protect their interests. They require such a champion, at least as much as the surgeons.

ENFRANCHISEMENT OF COPYHOLDS.

WHEN the Act for the Enfranchisement of Copyholds was passing through the Parliament, it was loudly trumpeted as a great boon to the public, and certain to effect, in a very few years, the entire removal of those remnants of feudality—the copyholds. At first it was proposed to make enfranchisement, at a fair value, compulsory upon the lords; but ultimately it was resolved to give fair trial to an amicable arrangement in the first instance, with an understanding that what was refused to grace should be forced by legislative interference.

Some years have now elapsed, and the copyholds voluntarily enfranchised are extremely few. As was the case with the tithes, opposing parties cannot agree as to the value of their interests. The lord demands too much, the tenant offers too little. There is no chance of the enfranchisement of the copyholds by voluntary settlements for as many centuries to come as they have already existed. The manner in which the system is working will be best exhibited by an instance that has fallen within our personal knowledge.

The Manor of Taunton Dean, in Somerset, is a copyhold of inheritance. The fines and heriots are fixed and very trifling. The actual value of the fee is little more than nominal. But the lord demands for it most exorbitant prices. Thus he lately required 150*l.* for the fee of a small plot of ground of which the fine did not exceed 10*s.* per annum,—that is, about sixteen times its actual value!!

Probably our readers could produce instances of demands equally extortionate in other manors, and we should be obliged by information upon the subject, for the time is come when the compulsory emancipation of copyholds must be urged upon the legislature. A fair trial has been given to the voluntary system. It has failed utterly. The understanding was, that if it did not succeed a more stringent measure should be adopted. We need not say that to the Profession the subject is one of great moment. The emancipation of copyholds would throw among the Profession generally a vast amount of business now confined to a few stewards. It is, therefore, worth an effort, and it is another proof of the want of some organization by which the concerns of the Profession might be cared for and their influence centred on one point. Here, too, the Law Amendment Society might render worthy service. The enfranchisement of copyholds is a subject that should receive their early consideration,—it is more practical and more urgent than many of those we see upon their books.

RAILWAY LITIGATION.

We have reported all the most interesting cases of the past week growing out of the railway litigation. It will be seen that the decisions are of very great importance, and further elucidate the yet unsettled law on these matters. We have also received some communications from correspondents, which shall have an early place. We defer until next week a reply to their objections, and the further commentaries upon the points at issue in the present railway litigation, which have been called for by the new decisions of the present week.

THE CRITIC.

New Books.

The Equitable Jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery; comprising its rise, progress, and final establishment, &c. By GEORGE SPENCE, Esq. one of her Majesty's Counsel. In 2 vols. Vol. the First. London, 1846. Stevens and Norton.
This work has a far wider interest than most of those that invite the attention of a legal periodical. It is something more than a mere Law Book. It aspires to the character of History. Every lawyer who deserves the name must read it, and every man who desires an insight into the rise and progress of our social and political fabric ought to do so. The object proposed by Mr. SPENCE is no less an one than "to trace the outlines of the history of the Laws of England, so far as they relate to property." In pursuance of this design, it has been his purpose to explain how those laws came to be administered by distinct tribunals, the Courts of Common Law and the Court of Chancery, and to point out the boundary lines between their respective jurisdictions.

In order to this, Mr. SPENCE has gone back to the earliest authentic records of a defined civil jurisprudence, which followed the introduction of Roman laws and institutions. He has then reviewed the laws established by the Anglo-Saxons and Danes, "endeavouring," he says, "to interpret those codes by reference to the state of society at the time, and to the existing customs disclosed" by the various documents he had examined. He has further attempted to ascertain "how much of those laws and customs may be considered as original or indigenous, or of native invention, how much as the result of imitation or adoption."

The Feudal System, its origin, rise and progress, are next reviewed, and with great learning and research it is shown how far that system prevailed in England down to the period of the Conquest. Mr. SPENCE differs in his views from most of his predecessors, but he advances no opinions without adducing his authorities, and the suggestions of an original thinker will form a valuable contribution to the mass of information from which the truth is to be ultimately evolved.

The second part of the work commences with the Conquest, and the author has endeavoured to present the real nature of that event, and its actual effect upon the pre-existing laws and constitution of England. He next traces the rise and establishment of the common law, pointing out its sources, and concluding with an account of its leading principles, and of its system of judicial procedure with reference to the rights of property.

The rise, progress, and final establishment of the modern equitable jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery is next examined, and the author points out the reasons which gave occasion for the establishment of a court having a distinct jurisdiction from that of the Courts of Common Law, the nature and extent of the powers of that court, and the principles upon which its jurisdiction was originally founded, and detailing the divisions into which that jurisdiction ultimately settled down, and so to exhibit the leading features and principles of the modern jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery.

Such, as described by Mr. SPENCE in his preface, is the bold and extensive design of this work, of which the first volume is now submitted to the Profession. And the execution is altogether worthy of that design. Vast industry has been bestowed upon the collection of the materials, sound judgment has been exercised in the selection of the valuable from the worthless, and the skill of an accomplished writer has been exhibited in the manner of presenting them to the reader. Although extremely learned, Mr. SPENCE's pages are never dull or dry. They have none of the repulsiveness of legal lore, but by the author's happy manner of expressing himself in plain English, where words could be found, and avoiding technicalities save where no equivalent was to be had, he has contrived to make of a seemingly unattractive subject a book that not only abounds in information, but which will be read for amusement, and not by lawyers alone, but by all students of English history.

Our quarterly friend, the Law Magazine, will doubtless make this volume the subject of a long and interesting paper. The weekly journalist, with his more restricted space and more numerous and urgent claims upon it, is compelled to be more brief than the intrinsic merits of such a publication as this may seem to deserve. But we regret the less that we are unable to review it more fully, because it is a work which every lawyer will place upon his shelves, not for reference only, but to be read and studied from the beginning to the end. To the law student especially must it be commended as the best introduction to the history of the law yet offered him. It should be read immediately after "Blackstone," and before he enters upon books of practice; for when he has learned the origin of the courts, of their jurisdiction, and of their forms of procedure, he will find them more readily committed to memory, and will see good reasons for many things which otherwise might appear to him meaningless and absurd.

We have been unwilling longer to delay a notice of this volume, and so we introduce it to our readers thus briefly during the press of the Term reports. But we do not purpose thus to dismiss it. As soon as the business of the courts is somewhat relaxed and space permits, it is our intention to return to it, and, with a few more commentaries upon the contents, to present some extracts that will illustrate the remarks we have now made, and also yield some useful information to our readers.

JOURNAL OF PROPERTY.

ON

By WILLIAM HUGHES, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

6. Attendant terms.

Where a term has been assigned to attend the inheritance, the deed or other assurance by which the term was created should be fully abstracted, but the meane assignments may be abstracted very shortly. (1 Prest. Abs. 25.)

7. Copyhold assurances.

In titles relating to copyhold estates, in addition to the deed declaring the uses, the date of the surrenders and admittances, by whom made, and to whom, should be set forth; such being, in substance, the actual mode by which property of that description is conveyed from one party to another. Any particular manorial customs that may affect the property should also be mentioned, as also the admittance of the customary heir as such; and where any estate tail has been barred, the mode in which it has been done should be stated, in order that it may be seen that the customary requisites and formalities have been duly complied with, and any agreements or other transaction than can in any way affect the equitable title, should also be shown. (1 Prest. Abs. 204.) In case the property has been devised by will, it should be so stated, whether there was any surrender to the use of such will. Such a surrender is not, however, now necessary to give validity to a will of copyhold property made subsequent to the year 1815. (Stat. 55 Geo. 3, c. 192.) But that statute, it must be observed, is only prospective.

8. Wills.

The date of the will itself, and not the time at which it is proved, is what should be set opposite to the commencement of will in the outer margin of the abstract. A will should be abstracted more fully than a deed, and, generally speaking, every charge affecting the abstracted premises should be inserted. Yet, where the property is devised upon trust to pay debts and legacies, it will not be absolutely necessary to set out and specify the legacies; because, where real estate is devised for purposes of this kind, the purchaser is not bound to see that the legacies are paid; nor is he, in fact, in any way responsible as to the manner in which his purchase-money may be applied; and the like rule holds also with respect to real property devised to be sold for the payment of debts (Humble v. Bull, 1 Ex. Cs. Abr. 345; Smith v. Guyon, 1 Bro. C. C. 186; Williamson v. Curtis, 3 ib. 96; Barker v. Duke of Devonshire, 3 Mer. 310; 3 Prest. Abs. 360) unless such debts are specified and scheduled; but if scheduled, or if even specifically mentioned in the will, the purchaser will be responsible for the application of the purchase-money, and must see that it is applied in liquidation of those charges unless the will contains an express clause exonerating purchasers from all responsibility with respect to the application of such purchase-money (3 Prest. Abs. 360; Pays v. Adams, Rolls, July 30, 1841, 10 Law J., N. S. 107). But the latter rule will not apply to leasehold estates sold by executors in that character, they being by law intrusted with a power of converting the personal estate of their testator into money for the purpose of paying his debts, the application of which a purchaser has no right whatever to interfere with; consequently from the actual necessity, and in common justice, he is exonerated from seeing how it is laid out, beyond the liquidation of those charges upon the property which are independent of the will, as mortgages, or other charges thereon, anterior to such will. (Butl. note to 1 Ins. 290; 3 Prest. Abs. 259, 260.) The fact of probate should be set out at the foot of the will, stating the court in which it was proved, and by whom; as also the day of the month and year in which such probate was obtained. If the will is registered in consequence of the devised lands lying within a register county, the fact of registration should be stated. (1 Prest. Abs. 182, 185.)

9. Fines and Recoveries.

In the case of fines and recoveries, the practice is to set out in the outer margin the term and reign of the king or queen for the time being in which they were levied or suffered, and not the day of the month and year in which those assurances were made: "as Hilary Term, 40 Geo. 3." In the case of a fine, the abstract should specify what particular species of fine it was; as sur cognisance de droit come ceo, &c. sur concesses, &c.; and should also contain the names of the parties, viz. the conusor, conusee, as also the parcels as set out in the fine, with their local situation. In the exemplification of a recovery, the names of the demandant, tenant, and vouches, in the course and order in which the parties were respectively vouched; as also all the parcels with their local description, as well as the time at which the writ of seisin was returnable, and seisin delivered, should be all stated.

10. Commission or fiat in bankruptcy.

In the case of a commission or fiat in bankruptcy prior to the statute of the 1 & 2 Wm. 4, c. 56, it is requisite to abstract the commission commencing with the date, which should be inserted in the usual manner in the outer margin, then stating the commission or fiat, and the names of the commissioners, with the clause of quorum, in order that it may be seen whether the commissioners have duly exercised their authority, and, of course, the deed of bargain and sale of the commissioners. (1 Prest. Abs. 167.) But the property of bankrupts, since the passing of the Act above alluded to, vests in the assignees, without any other conveyance in the abstracting which the recital of the trading and act of bankruptcy, as also the appointment of the assignees, should be set out rather fully; unless where the bankrupt himself concurred in the conveyance, who, in that case, would be estopped from disputing either of the above facts.

11. Insolvency.

Where the title is traced through an insolvent, if the proceedings be prior to the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, the time of presenting and filing of the petition by the insolvent, the conveyance and assignment to the provisional assignee, and the conveyance and assignment by such provisional assignee to the creditor's assignee, must be set out in the abstract; and these assurances, which are filed of record in the court, must be authenticated by a copy of such record made upon parchment under the seal of such court. (Stat. 7 Geo. 4, c. 57, ss. 11, 19.) If the proceedings are subsequent to the above-mentioned statute of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, then the order made under such last-mentioned Act duly entered of record of the petition of the insolvent, or upon the petition of an execution creditor, vesting the estate and effects of the insolvent in the provisional assignee, and likewise the order appointing the creditor's assignee, must be set out in the abstract; and must be verified by such certified copy written out upon parchment under the seal of the Court (ss. 42, 45, 46). And where any conveyance of an insolvent would require to be registered, in that case, as the certified copy should be registered in the same manner as an ordinary conveyance, the fact of registration should be mentioned in the abstract.

If the proceedings are under the Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, which authorizes the Court of Bankruptcy to administer relief to insolvent debtors at large, the abstract should set out the insolvent's petition for protection from process, the nomination by the commissioner of the official assignee, and then the final order made by the commissioner for the protection of the person of the insolvent from all process, and for the vesting of his estate and effects in the official and creditor's assignee. And as this act requires a meeting of the creditors to be called before the assignee can sell the real estate, the fact of the meeting having been held, and the resolution of the creditors approving and directing the sale, should perhaps properly appear on the abstract. (Sidebottom v. Barrington, 4 Beav. 110; Wright v. Maunier, ib. 512.)

12. Acts of Parliament.

Where there is any private Act of Parliament relating to the title, the usual practice is to abstract it very shortly, because a printed form of the Act itself is always forwarded with the abstract.

13. Judgments.

It was not formerly usual to abstract judgments, the practice being for the purchaser to search for them, except in those cases where such search was rendered unnecessary by the equitable protection afforded by an attendant term, or the like; but as since the statute of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 10, judgments are made an actual charge upon the lands, the vendor's solicitor ought to abstract them.

14. Decrees.

Decrees or decretal orders, where they in any way affect the property, should be abstracted. And wherever there has been a reference to the Master upon any point relating to the title, his report, together with the order or decree thereupon, should be stated.

15. Descents.

Descents should be proved by an authenticated pedigree, in which the names of the parties, and the days of their births, marriages, and deaths, as also of the respective ages at which they each respectively died, all of which should be copied out verbatim. To this should be added extracts from ancient leases, or land tax, assessments, or such other evidence of ownership as can be produced to shew the manner in which, and by whom, the property has been enjoyed.

16. Administration.

Where letters of administration have been granted, it should be mentioned whether they were general or special, the name of the Court out of which they were obtained, and to whom granted. The date also should be set out in the usual way in the outer margin.

17. Matters of fact.

Matters of fact, such as births, marriages, and deaths, should be inserted in the order in which they occur; and if authenticated by certificates, the latter with the dates of the events therein certified should be set out. In the case of intestacy, letters of administration are the most satisfactory evidence of that fact, and if they have been obtained they should be abstracted for that purpose.

18. Cancellation, alteration, or erasure of documents.

Before dismissing this portion of my subject, I consider it will be proper to remark that no fact or circumstance whatever connected with the title should be omitted, simply because such fact or circumstance may be insufficient to invalidate it. Take, for example, the case of the cancellation of a material deed, which, as the law now stands, will not annul it, or restore the estate to the former proprietor (Magennis v. McCullough, Gilb. Eq. Cas. 235; Bolton v. Carlisle (Bishop of), 2 Hen. Blackst. 264; Perrott v. Perrott, 14 East, 423; see also Roe v. York (Archbishop of), 6 East, 86; Doe dem. Courtail v. Thomas, 9 B. & C. 288). Still a fact of that kind ought not to be passed by unnoticed in the abstract. If an erasure or interlineation has been made subsequent to the execution of the instrument, that fact should be disclosed, together with the manner and circumstances under which it was done; and the more particularly so, as a fraudulent alteration by either of those means, if made by the person himself taking under it, would vitiate his interest altogether. It was, indeed, formerly considered that an alteration by erasure or interlineation, would avoid the whole instrument, even if made by a mere stranger. But the strictness of this rule has been latterly so far relaxed, that, as the law now stands, an alteration by a stranger will not of itself invalidate a deed or other instrument; so that now the original contents will still be allowed to retain their effect and operation, if it can be clearly shewn what that effect and operation was. To accomplish this the mutilated instrument may be given in evidence as far as its contents appear; and extrinsic evidence will be admitted to shew what parts have been erased or altered, as also of the words contained in such altered or erased parts; but if for want of this evidence, or any uncertainty arising out of it, the original contents of the deed cannot be ascertained, then the old rule would become applicable, or, more properly speaking, the deed would become void for uncertainty. In cases of this or a like kind, every fact and circumstance, as I have before stated, connected with such alteration or erasure, should be fully revealed by the abstract. See 1 Prest. Abs. 156, 157.

A freehold estate, comprising the celebrated Glazenwood Horticultural Orchard, Nursery, and American Gardens, containing about 50 acres, with an excellent mansion and a newly-erected villa residence, situate three miles from Braine-tree, in the parish of Bradwell Nest, Coggeshall, in two lots, as follows:—

The first lot comprises the mansion-house and 38 acres of land, including the Australian garden and filbert orchard—3,900l.

The second lot comprises the horticultural garden, American garden, conservatories, and orchard, together with a residence and other buildings, in all 12 acres—1,400l.

VALUE OF LAND.—At an auction, at Crewkerne, held by Mr. Eales White, some land was sold at the rate of nearly 200l. per acre, not for building, but purely for agricultural purposes, and at some distance from the town. Surely such instances as these will serve to dispel the apprehensions of alarmists.—Taunton Courier.

SALE OF THE ST. JAMES'S CLUB-HOUSE.—On Tuesday, at one o'clock, by order of the executors of the late Mr. Crockford, the St. James's Club-house, St. James's-street, better known by the title of "Crockford's," with the whole of the furniture, &c. was brought to the hammer, Messrs. Christie and Manson being the auctioneers. The first lot put up was the unexpired lease of twenty-two years of the building, which the auctioneer stated was built some few years since under the direction of Mr. Wyatt, the well-known architect; the decoration of the building alone costing the late proprietor 94,000l. The premises are held under three leases, for terms which expire at Michaelmas 1868, at a yearly rent of 1,400l. and are insured by the lessor at the sum of 11,000l. a covenant in the lease also compelling the lessee for the time being to insure in a further sum of 6,000l. Mr. Manson said he was aware that the building was not suitable to the multitude, but for the purposes of a public institution nothing could be better. The first offer for the lease was 1,000l. and eventually it was knocked down for 2,900l. Who the purchaser was could not be ascertained.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

Saturday, June 6.

THWAITES v. FORMAN.

Practice—Staying cause after decree in another suit for administration—Construction—Priority of gifts—Parties.

Where there are two suits against executors for administration by different legatees, in two branches of the court, and a decree has been obtained in one suit, the defendants may apply in the other suit to stay all proceedings therein, and the Court is quite competent to suspend the cause within its own jurisdiction until the other cause has been finally disposed of.

Where a testator, after directing his real and personal estate to be converted into money, directs that, "in the first place," one annuity shall be provided for, and, "in the next place," another annuity be provided for, by the appropriation of stock or real security, or by the purchase of government annuities, and then proceeds to make other bequests, there is nothing in the expressions "in the first place," and "in the next place," to give the annuitants priority over the other legatees.

The plaintiff, Elizabeth Thwaites, was an annuitant of 30l. a year under the will of Henry Thwaites, the testator in the cause, dated the 25th July, 1839, and the bill was filed for payment of the arrears of the annuity, and to have a fund set apart to answer the annuity. The testator had also bequeathed an annuity of 100l. a year to his brother, John Thwaites, the father of the plaintiff, in satisfaction of a security to that amount. John Thwaites had since died, and the plaintiff, as his personal representative, claimed also the arrears of that annuity. The plaintiff, by her bill, insisted that, on a right construction of the will, these two annuities were entitled to priority over the legacies given by the will. This cause was in the list of causes before Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce. There was another suit of Osborn v. Forman for the administration of the same testator's estate, in which a decree for an account had been made by Vice-Chancellor Wigram. Before that decree had been left for entry, the defendants moved to stay proceedings before Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, who dismissed the bill as against the testator's heir-at-law, and directed all further proceedings to be stayed till further order, without prejudice to any application which the plaintiff might think fit to make in the other cause to Vice-Chancellor Wigram, and the costs were reserved. If the plaintiff's claim to priority was established, she would have been entitled to a personal decree against the defendants, inasmuch as other legacies, &c. had been paid, and there was some expectation that the estate would prove deficient. The Vice-Chancellor had decided against the plaintiff's claim to priority; from that decree the plaintiff appealed.

Parker and Glasse, for the appeal, contended that the plaintiff was not bound to wait until the accounts in that cause had been taken. The testator devised and bequeathed considerable real and personal estate to the defendants Forman and Shipley in the following terms:—"As to all and every my messuages, farms, lands, hereditaments, and real estate whatsoever, and as to all my moneys, securities for money, rents, &c. not specifically devised and bequeathed to Forman and Shipley, their heirs, executors, and administrators, upon trust as to the real estate, and so much of the personal estate as should not consist of money, to sell; and I direct that the said trustees should stand possessed of the money to arise from such sales upon trust, in the first place, to pay certain sums [sums the testator stated himself to be under covenant to pay] and my funeral and testamentary expenses; and in the second place, to set apart and appropriate on government or real security an annuity of 100l. which I am bound to pay to my brother John, and an annuity of 30l. to Elizabeth [the plaintiff] the daughter of my said brother, for her life." And the said testator directed that his trustees might be at liberty to purchase government annuities instead of making investments to meet these annuities. The testator had plainly indicated his intention to prefer these annuitants; but the plaintiff had received only a small part of her own annuity or of the arrears due to her late father. The trustees had, notwithstanding, paid away large sums to other legatees, amounting to 6,000l. including 750l. to the executors. (Brown v. Brown, 1 Keen, 275.) The answer intimates a doubt whether the estate will be sufficient to pay all the legacies. The bill in this suit was filed on the 7th of November, 1843, and the plaintiff learnt from the answer of the executors, put in on the 28th of January, 1844, that the suit of Osborn v. Forman was pending. They contended that the mere pendency of another suit by another legatee or annuitant formed no reason why the present suit should not proceed. In May 1844 the cause of Osborn v. Forman was heard before the Vice-Chancellor Wigram, and it was afterwards, on the 26th of June, put in his honour's paper to be spoken to. The decree as drawn up now bears that date, but it was not drawn up, and therefore did not become an efficient decree till the 13th of November, 1844. On the 26th of June, 1844, the plaintiff's solicitor received from the defendants' solicitor a notice, entitled in the two causes, informing the plaintiff that a decree had been pronounced, by which the estates had been ordered to be sold, and directed all to be done that could be done in Thwaites v. Forman, and required the plaintiff to incur no further expense in that suit, and gave notice that, in case of non-compliance, the defendant would move to stay proceedings in this suit. On the 6th of July, 1844, subpoena to hear judgment was served in this cause, and, on the 9th of July, a notice of motion, also entitled in this cause, was served upon the plaintiff, whereby it was stated that the Court would be moved to stay all proceedings in the cause of Thwaites v. Forman. The motion was ordered to come on with the cause, and the matter was partly argued before the vacation. On the 6th of December the order was pronounced, against which the plaintiff appealed. The case is reported, as heard in the court below, 1 Col. 409, and the Vice-Chancellor referred to Beeston v. Booth, 4 Mad. 161, but that case is distinguishable from the present.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The only words you can rely upon are those in which the testator says, "after making the investments," &c. Does that go beyond Beeston v. Booth?

Parker.—The other interests do not commence until these annuities are provided for.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Suppose the words had been "and then," would this case not have fallen precisely within the authority of Beeston v. Booth?

Parker.—As to the stay of proceedings.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The Vice-Chancellor then went upon the assumption that all are to take equally.

Parker.—Yes; up to the decree, any person having claim against a testator's estate by reason of a legacy or debt, may proceed with his own suit. The pendency of another suit amounts to nothing. There is a settled rule as to the mode and terms of staying proceedings in these suits. Leave is given to the plaintiff in the second suit to come in under the other cause, with costs up to the hearing. Here there is no power to go in under the decree, and no provision for the plaintiff's costs.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The Court will not stay proceedings in the usual way; this case is not within the general rule, for the plaintiff chose to go on, and the decision was against her.

Parker.—The motion was irregular, for it was entitled in Thwaites v. Forman only, and it ought to have been entitled in both causes. The Vice-Chancellor regretted he had not jurisdiction, because the other cause was before another branch of the Court. The defendant should have come to your lordship and asked for leave to give a notice of motion in both causes.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I think the notice of motion should have been in both causes, or leave to give notice should have been obtained in the way pointed out by Mr. Parker.

Parker.—The Vice-Chancellor said he had jurisdiction in one cause only, and all he could do was to direct the cause to stand over. The other suit was instituted by residuary legatees, and there were no parties present to protect the interests of annuitants and other legatees. The Vice-Chancellor said they might have applied to the Lord Chancellor, and that he could not conceive why some means had not been taken to place the two causes in one branch of the court.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The difficulty seems to have arisen from that.

Parker.—The Vice-Chancellor said, if he could he would have referred this cause to the same Master, and consolidated the two causes. (Jackson v. Leag, 1 Jac. & Walk. 229; Eades v. Harris, 1 Harc.) In Seton on Decrees, it is stated that the plaintiff is entitled to go and obtain his costs up to the hearing; and that notice is ineffectual. The common decree is, that the Master shall be at liberty to adopt proceedings in the other cause. (Vernon v. Thellason, 1 Phillips.) A suit by legatees or creditors is never stayed except upon the terms stated.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—What difference will it make whether I make an order on the decree or the motion?

Parker.—If the order is made on the decree it will be in the common form, reserving further directions and costs.

Glasse, on the same side, cited Rogers v. Soutten, 2 Keen, 598; The Corporation of Clergymen's Sons v. Swainson, 1 Ves. sen. 75; Whitlam v. Heming, 2 Sim. 493. The decree in this cause should be the common decree, referring the cause to the same Master as the other cause had been referred to, with liberty to adopt the accounts and conclusions he had come to in that cause. With the present order, that was impracticable, and therefore the plaintiff was bound to appeal. This suit was not to be tied up for an indefinite time. Besides, the objection would be taken of want of parties, that all the other annuitants and legatees should have been parties to the suit notwithstanding the 30th Order of August, 1841, on the authority of Miller v. Huddleston, 13 Sim. 467. That objection was taken in the other suit of Osborn v. Forman, 2 Harc. 666.

Anderton and Goodere, for the defendants, on the construction of the gifts of the annuities, contended that Beeston v. Booth was a conclusive authority against the plaintiff's claim to priority. On the point of practice the plaintiff had been offered her costs up to the time of the motion.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The proceedings in the cause were stayed, and the plaintiff had leave to apply in the other cause. Would it not have been sufficient to have made an order in this suit, to stay proceedings on payment of costs, when another suit for administration is pending, in which the accounts could be taken, and justice done between the parties? Is it necessary to do more than stay proceedings on payment of costs? Is it essential that there should be an order for leave for the plaintiff in this suit to attend the taking of the accounts?

Anderton.—No such order is ever made in a creditor's suit.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The Vice-Chancellor merely postponed the hearing of the cause; he directed it to stand over; the decree amounts to nothing more than a direction to let the cause stand over for the present, with leave to the parties to proceed in the other cause before Vice-Chancellor Wigram, as they think fit. That is only postponing his decision. Is that a ground of appeal? Mr. Parker says the established precedent has been departed from.

Goodere.—The cases cited on the other side relate to creditors' suits. There is a distinction between creditors and legatees, because the former claim paramount to the will. The Court does not necessarily give legatees costs. The case in Jacob & Walker's Reports is founded on its special circumstances. The Court is not bound by any such rule. (Hayward v. Constable, 2 Young & Col. Exch. Rep. 43; Moore v. Prior, ibid. 375.) In the latter case the order was that the suit be stayed, and the question of costs was reserved. (Cumming v. Slater, You. & Col. C. C. 585.) The second cause was ordered to stand over, and come on with the other cause on further directions, and that one decree should be made in both suits. Here the Vice-Chancellor gave the plaintiff leave to apply in the other suit.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Why should he have leave to go in more than any other legatee? The Master makes a report upon the will, and any legatee may except to the report if his particular interest is not attended to, and if delay takes place, any legatee may apply to have the conduct of the cause. What is he to do? Leave to do what?

Parker.—To attend the proceedings in the Master's office.

Goodeve.—Other legatees have the same right to go in to watch the proceedings as the plaintiff.

Kenyon Parker, Roupell, jun. and Tripp, for other defendants.

Parker, in reply, cited Holden v. Kynaston, 2 Beavan, 205.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—This appeal must be dismissed. When the Court disposes of a cause, it disposes of the costs also; but here there was no final order, only a postponement of the final determination. As to the form of the order, it exactly corresponds with that in Moore v. Prior, in 2 Y. & Col. Exch. Rep. The question of costs is entirely in the discretion of the Court, which is quite competent to postpone the one cause until the other has been heard and finally disposed of. Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce doubtless thought that as he had no control over the other cause, some inconvenience might arise if he had made any order; and he adopted it, without any reference to the cause pending in the Court of Vice-Chancellor Wigram, as was done in the case reported in the Exchequer. I think it was quite competent to the Vice-Chancellor to take that course. As to the main question, the construction of the will, I must be quite satisfied the testator wished these annuities to be paid before the legatees, before I can reverse the decision of the Vice-Chancellor upon that ground; but I think no priority has been established. I cannot accede to the argument of Mr. Parker, that these annuities must be considered to come under the class of debts. Unless I am clearly satisfied that the testator intended a preference, I cannot give the annuitants priority; and there appears to me to be nothing in the will to take them out of the ordinary rule of equity, that all annuitants and legatees are to take equally. The appeal will be dismissed with costs.

Re Webb, in Lunacy.

Friday, May 29.

Practice in lunacy—Petition for a commission against a person abroad.

The petition in this matter was presented by Mr. F. Webb, the nephew and tenant in tail in remainder of an estate, of which John Webb, the alleged lunatic, was tenant for life. The petition prayed a commission to inquire into the state of mind of the alleged lunatic, stating that, after a confinement of several months in the establishments of two of the most eminent medical men in Paris, he was now in a state of hopeless insanity. The affidavits of Sir T. Cherrise, the physician to the British embassy, and several French physicians, corroborated this statement. Mr. Webb had large landed estates in Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, producing an income of 12,400*l.* but in consequence of an insane passion for pictures and articles of vertu, he had incurred debts to the extent of 58,600*l.* which had been paid by money borrowed from the West of England Fire and Life Assurance Company, and which now formed a charge on the life estate, requiring, with the sum for the insurance of the lunatic's life, an annual outlay of 4,900*l.* The expenses of management were 2,500*l.* more, and the petitioner alleged, that as the estates were in the hands of a manager who had not given any security, there was an additional reason for asking the protection of the Court.

Romilly and Busk supported the petition, James Parker and Walford opposed, and read affidavits to shew that Mr. Webb had been removed lately to an establishment in Paris, where the treatment was very different from that under which his illness had hitherto continued, and that there was a reasonable prospect of his recovery.

Bacon, for the Insurance Company.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The case is of such a nature that no harm can be done by allowing the case to stand over for a short time, in order to ascertain the effect of the new treatment to which Mr. Webb is now subjected. Let the matter be in the paper on the day before the last seal.

The matter has not been again mentioned.

VICE-CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND'S COURT.

Monday, Feb. 23.

GREGSON v. HINDLEY.

Mortgage—Tenant for life—Statute of Limitations.
A tenant for life of a mortgage estate, admitted by way of recital, in a deed that interest on the mortgage had been paid: Held, not to be a sufficient acknowledgment of the mortgage debt against the remainderman, to prevent the operation of the Statute of Limitations.

The bill stated, among other things, that by an indenture, bearing date the 12th of August, 1806, John Hindley mortgaged certain renewable leaseholds for lives, at Marton, to John Dawber, for 99*l.*, and at the same time executed a bond for the same sum; and that he afterwards further charged the said leaseholds with the repayment of 40*l.* to the said John Dawber. That the said John Hindley, by his will, bearing date the 5th of April, 1808, gave and bequeathed unto his wife Ann the said leaseholds, to hold the same, subject to certain yearly rents and payments, and also subject and chargeable with the payment of the interest of the sum of 99*l.*, secured thereon by way of mortgage, unto his said wife and her assigns, during the term of her natural life; and from and immediately after her decease, he gave and bequeathed the same unto his nephew, John Hindley, the defendant; subject and chargeable as aforesaid, and also subject and chargeable with the payment of the said principal sum of 99*l.* and interest thereon, to grow due from the decease of his said wife Ann. By a codicil to his will, bearing date the 15th Feb. 1817, the testator ratified and confirmed the devise of the said leaseholds to his said wife Ann and her assigns for her life, subject to the payment of the interest of such sum and sums of money as remained due and owing on mortgage of the same estate, or for which the title-deeds thereof might remain pledged; and from and after her decease he did ratify and confirm the devise thereof unto his said nephew, John Hindley, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, subject and chargeable, nevertheless, with the payment of the several charges in his will mentioned, and also to such sum and sums of money as might be then due and owing on mortgage of the same estate, or for which the title-deeds might remain pledged by way of security. That John Hindley died in August, 1817. The bill, moreover, stated that by an indenture, bearing date the 18th day of August, 1839, after reciting, as the facts were, among other things, that the said two principal sums of 99*l.* and 40*l.* (amounting together to the sum of 1,036*l.*) only remained due and owing upon the said several securities, "all interest for the same having been paid." It was witnessed that, in consideration of 1,036*l.* Charles Wigglesworth, Sarah Wigglesworth, John Stowe and Rebecca his wife (the representatives of John Dawber, then deceased), with the privity and consent of Ann Hindley, then Ann Milns, did assign unto the plaintiff, Joseph Gregson, his executors, administrators, and assigns, all the said two principal sums of 99*l.* and 40*l.* and all interest to grow due thereon, and all the benefit and advantage thereof respectively, to have and enjoy the said principal sum and interest, as and for his and their own proper goods and chattels for ever. And by the same indenture the said leaseholds were also assigned to the plaintiff, John Gregson, his heirs and assigns, subject to a proviso for redemption on payment by Ann Milns, or the person who, after her decease, should be entitled in reversion to the said hereditaments, unto the plaintiff, John Gregson, his executors, administrators, or assigns, the sum of 1,036*l.* and interest. That the name of the plaintiff, John Gregson, was made use of in the said last-mentioned indenture, as a trustee for the said Ann Milns, and that the said sum of 1,036*l.* was in fact advanced by her. That Ann Milns died in 1842. The bill then, among other things, prayed that the defendant, John Hindley, might be decreed to obtain a renewed lease of the mortgaged premises, and that such renewed lease might be declared to be well charged with the payment of the said principal money and interest.

Wakefield and Faber, for the plaintiff, contended that the interest had been paid from time to time, and that it was not at all probable that it should have been paid all at once.

Bethell contended that, so far from there being any proof that interest had been paid from year to year, there was not even an allegation that interest had been paid from the death of the mortgagor in 1817, till the executing the indenture of 1839, an interval of more than twenty years, and therefore the Statute of Limitations would operate as a bar.

Roupell, Malins, Metcalf, Tennant, Campbell, Goldsmith, Hubbard, Bennett, and Barton, for the several other parties.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—What you are required to prove is, that payments of interest have been made within twenty years. As to the fact stated in the bill, taking it at the utmost, is, that on the 18th of August, 1839, all interest had been paid; very different indeed from an averment that interest had been paid during the interval of twenty years. Now this is a peculiar case, for it appears that the equity of redemption was devised to A for life, with remainder to B. Suppose it to be the fact that, for more than twenty years, no interest had been paid during A's life, a serious question would arise, namely, whether, after the reversioner had obtained the benefit of the Statute, it would be competent for the tenant for life, by her own act, to create a mortgage that should be redeemable. What the plaintiff seeks is, that he may have liberty to prove that payments of interest were made from time to time; but this was not coincident with the statement in the indenture, as that might mean, for any thing to the contrary appearing, that a lumping sum had been paid. My opinion is, that for the sake of admitting proof of payment from time to time, a specific set of facts ought to have been alleged in the bill. I can easily conceive that the grossest fraud might be practised on the remainderman, as for a mere sixpence the tenant for life might sign an acknowledgment that no interest was due.

Bill dismissed, but without prejudice to the right of filing a new bill.

Monday, March 9.

MUSTON v. BRADSHAW.

Pleading—Specific performance of agreement—Deeds in possession of vendor's wife.

A purchaser filed his bill for specific performance, wherein he stated that upon application to the vendor for inspection of certain title-deeds belonging to the property, he refused to produce them, on the ground of his not being able to make out a good title or to produce the said title-deeds, by reason of his wife, H. B. having broken open a box and taken them away, the contrary whereof the plaintiff charged to be true; the bill nevertheless stated that the vendor's wife admitted that the said deeds were in her possession, but that she claimed an interest in, or had some claim upon the estate for her sole and separate use independently of her husband, and refused to deliver up or produce any of the said deeds or documents, unless her said alleged interest or claim was first satisfied, or some provision made for her out of the purchase-money. The plaintiff charged that the vendor's wife had not, and never had, any interest in the said estate, but if she had, it was subject to the plaintiff's contract, and that there was collusion between the vendor and his wife to defeat the agreement. The bill prayed that, if necessary, the defendants might answer separately and for specific performance, and that H. B. the vendor's wife, might be decreed to deliver up the title-deeds. A demurrer by H. B. for want of equity allowed.

It appears by the bill, that by an agreement bearing date the 2nd of April, 1845, the defendant, G. M. Bradshaw, agreed to sell, and the plaintiff agreed to purchase, the property in question for 7,999*l.* subject to a good title being thereunto made. That various applications had been made by the plaintiff to the said defendant, G. M. Bradshaw, to perform his part of the said agreement; but that he refused so to do, alleging his inability to make out a good title to the freehold and inheritance of the premises in question, and particularly that he was unable to deliver up, or procure to be delivered up, the title-deeds and muniments of title relating thereto; but the plaintiff charged the contrary of such allegations and pretences to be the truth. The bill then charged, that shortly after the 15th of May, 1845, the defendant, G. M. Bradshaw, stated to the plaintiff, that all the deeds relating to the title of the estate were then in his possession, and that plaintiff and his solicitor could see such deeds; that on the 22nd May, 1845, the plaintiff, with his solicitor, attended at the house of the defendant, Bradshaw, who produced all the title-deeds relating to the said estate; and, amongst others, indentures of lease and release of the 29th and 30th October, 1776, and a certain other deed bearing date the 6th October, 1841, which completed his aforesaid title; the last of which deeds was a conveyance of the legal estate from the trustees of a will under which defendant was entitled to other trustees, to uses to bar dower. The bill then charged that on a subsequent occasion the plaintiff and his solicitor attended at the house of the defendant for the purpose of examining the said title-deeds, and upon applying to the defendant to produce the said deeds, he refused so to do, alleging that he was unable to produce the said deeds and documents, by reason, as he alleged, that his, the said defendant's, wife had broken open a box in which the said defendant had kept such deeds and documents, and had taken them away, and that his said wife refused to give them up to him, or to inform him where the same were; and the said defendant also alleged that, under such circumstances, the said deeds were no longer under his control. The bill then charged that afterwards, and on the same occasion, Harriett Bradshaw, the wife of the said defendant, came into the room, and she then and there admitted or stated that the said deeds, or some of them, were in her possession; or that she knew where they then were, and could produce them; but she also then and there stated that she claimed an interest in, or had some claim upon, the said estate, or to that effect; and although she did not then state, and, in fact, upon being asked to do so, refused to state what her said alleged interest or claim was, she positively refused to deliver up or produce any of the said deeds and documents, or to state where the same were, unless her said alleged interest or claim was first satisfied, or some provision was made for her out of the said estate, or the purchase-money for the same. The bill then charged, that the said female defendant still claims some interest in the said estate, and in the said deeds; and she claims such interest for her sole and separate use, and independently of the said other defendant, her husband; but that, in fact, she has not and never had any interest whatever in the said estate, or any part thereof, or the said deeds; and, at all events, she has not, and never had, any interest therein, otherwise than subject to the said agreement of the 2nd of April last, nor any interest therein at all against the plaintiff, as such purchaser as aforesaid, or which entitles her to hold or retain the said indenture and deed, or either of them, as against the plaintiff; and her alleged interest therein arose after the date and execution of the said agreement, and by collusion with the said other defendant, in order to defeat such agreement. The bill prayed that, if necessary, the defendant might be ordered to answer separately; and that the defendant, G. M. Bradshaw, might be decreed specifically to perform the agreement of 2nd of April, 1845, and to do all acts necessary for that purpose, and especially to deliver up, or cause or procure to be delivered up to the plaintiff, by the said other defendant, or any other person in whose possession the same might be, the aforesaid indentures of lease and release of the 29th and 30th of October, 1776, and the said deed of the 6th of October, 1841, and all other deeds, instruments, writings, &c. the plaintiff offering to perform his part of the said agreement; and that it might be declared that the said female defendant had no interest in the said estate, or in any of the title-deeds and documents relating thereto, or otherwise; that it might be declared, that if she had any such interest therein, the same was subject to and without prejudice to the aforesaid agreement, and it is now void against the plaintiff; and that the said female defendant might be decreed to deliver up to plaintiff the said indentures of lease and release of the 29th and 30th of October, 1776, and the deed of the 6th of October, 1841. And also that an injunction might issue against the defendants, to restrain them from parting with the said documents. To this bill the defendant, Harriett Bradshaw, demurred, for want of equity.

Stuart and Steer, in support of the demurrer, contended that the bill was wrongly framed; for part of it prayed that Mrs. Bradshaw might be directed to answer separately from her husband, contrary to the doctrine of the Court, which will not act against a married in personam at all. There was, therefore, no ground to make Mrs. B. a defendant. Moreover, she was, in the bill, stated to have no interest. The rule of a court of equity is, that a married woman can only be brought before the Court in a matter relating to her separate property; but the decree is sought to be obtained personally against her. Is the allegation of her being in possession of a particular deed sufficient? If it be in her possession, it is the possession of the husband. Assuming, however, the statements in the bill to be correct, it is a case of adverse claim to the husband; the wife should then be a co-plaintiff; but this would have been only upon the ground of her having separate property. Cases cited:—Aylett v. Ashton, 1 My. & C. 105; Langley v. Fisher, 5 Bea. 443; Francis v. Weyssell, 1 Mad. 258; Tasker v. Small, 3 My. & C. 63; Martin v. Mitchell, 2 J. & W. 425.

Bethell and Toller, in support of the bill.—The argument used on the other side might be available, provided the demurrer had been that of the husband; but this lady is represented, first, as having, with a knowledge of the contract, fraudulently colluded with her husband to defeat the contract. Secondly, that for such purpose, she delivered to some other person the title-deeds in question. Thirdly, she is clearly represented, by the bill, as claiming an interest subordinate to the contract, and, therefore, that interest must be paid out of the purchase-money. We admit that a married woman cannot answer or demur except where there is an allegation that she has a separate interest in the suit. Now it is directly stated upon the bill that Mrs. Bradshaw claims some interest to her separate use, but then we charge that such claim is subordinate to our contract, and was created merely for the purpose of defeating our agreement. Suppose that, subsequent to the contract, the vendor had entered into collusion with A. B. and given him an interest in the property, A. B. having notice of the contract, can it be contended that A. B. ought not to be made a party? [THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The only question is, whether it sufficiently appears upon the face of this bill that the wife has an interest? The plaintiff asserts that she has none; and you state expressly that the husband alone can make a good title.] The wife may have an interest in the purchase-money. What we state is, that she has no interest against the plaintiff, although she may have as against the purchase-money.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Taking the whole case together, my opinion is that the plaintiff is bound by his own general allegations. In the first place, where the pretence is put into the husband's mouth of his inability to make a good title, the plaintiff expressly charges the contrary of such pretence to be true, and the bill throughout states that what this lady says is false, provided the husband can make a good title. As to the objection of filing a separate demurrer, I do not see how it affects the case. The question now is, whether the demurrer as it stands is good or bad. I must take the record as I find it, and I am bound to say I think the demurrer good.

Bethell.—Then your Honour will give us leave to amend?

Stuart objected, on the ground that it was a demurrer to an amended bill, and that if the plaintiff were allowed to further amend by stating the wife had no interest, it would be contrary to the bill as it then stood.

His Honour allowed the demurrer, but with leave to amend the bill, which was afterwards done by striking out that portion of it which charged the contrary of the vendor's pretences as to being unable to make a good title, and to produce the title-deeds, to be true, and instead thereof charged that, at the time of entering into such agreement, and down to the 22nd of May, 1845, he was able to make a good title and to produce the title-deeds; and by striking out the denial of any interest in Harriett Bradshaw to her separate use, and instead, charged that such alleged charge or interest, if any, was created by her said husband subsequently to and with full knowledge by the said H. Bradshaw of the said contract for sale, and in order if possible to defeat the said contract; and further charged that, if she should appear to be entitled to any sum of money for her separate use raised out of the said estate, then a sufficient part of the purchase-money ought to be applied thereto; charging also possession by H. Bradshaw of the title-deeds. H. Bradshaw again demurred for want of equity, which was allowed.

BENNETT v. COOPER.

Statute of Limitations—Mortgage—Trust to sell—Covenant—Assignment in Equity—Deed-poll—Appointment of attorney, operation of.

In the year 1816, A B mortgaged certain freehold premises for a term to C D, and entered into a covenant to pay the mortgage-money. In 1837, A B being then indebted in a sum of money to his bankers, he, together with C D, conveyed the premises in fee to the bankers on trust to sell and satisfy the debt due to themselves, and then that due to C D; and A B and C D entered into a joint and several covenant for the payment of the debt due to the bankers. In a few days after A B executed a deed-poll, whereby, in consideration of the debt due by him to C D, and C D's liability to the bankers, and in order to secure the repayment of the debt to him, he appointed C D, his attorney, to receive all sums thereafter to become due and owing to him (A B), and all legacies and bequests which should thereafter come to him or his then present or any future wife. From 1817 there was no evidence of any payment, nor of any acknowledgment of C D's debt, but as to the bankers, several transactions took place. In 1823, they entered into possession of the premises, and ultimately, in 1834, sold them, and applied the proceeds in payment of their debt, which was not thereby satisfied.

Held, that time did not run so as to bar the plaintiff's claim pending the execution of the trust; that the debt was a subsisting debt at the time of filing the bill; and that the deed-poll was valid and effectual, and operated as an assignment in equity of all sums of money and legacies thereafter receivable.

This was a suit instituted for the purpose of obtaining the benefit of a deed-poll executed by the defendant in 1817 in favour of his brother-in-law, the plaintiff, as a security for moneys lent, and an indemnity against his liability as surety for the defendant. The bill filed in October, 1842, stated that the defendant having in the year 1815 bought a mill and premises for 2,270*l.* borrowed 1,500*l.* from the plaintiff, and in January 1816 executed a mortgage for a term of years to secure the same, and covenanted to pay the money on the 1st of July then next, which, however, he failed to do. The defendant being indebted to his bankers to a considerable amount, and being pressed for payment, requested the plaintiff, and the plaintiff agreed to convey to them the mill and premises on trust to sell. Accordingly, by indentures of lease and release of the 22nd and 23rd of July, 1817, the premises were duly conveyed in fee to the bankers, on trust to sell and apply the proceeds in payment of the expenses of the sale, then in satisfying their own debt, and then in payment of the plaintiff's, which he agreed to postpone. And the plaintiff and defendant thereupon entered into a joint and several covenant to pay the debt, then amounting to 1,620*l.* 18*s.* 5*d.* due to the bankers, with interest; but, for the purpose of giving the plaintiff security and an indemnity for becoming surety, the defendant executed a deed-poll, bearing date the 7th of August, 1817, and thereby, after reciting that he was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of 1,500*l.* and that the plaintiff had become surety for him, and that divers persons owed him, the defendant, various sums, and that he and his wife had expectations from their relations, who would probably bequeath them legacies or sums of money, and that he was desirous of securing the said debt of 1,500*l.*; it was thereby witnessed that he, the said defendant, in consideration of the debt, and in order to secure the repayment thereof, did, by the said deed-poll, fully and absolutely nominate, constitute, and appoint the plaintiff, his executors, administrators, and assigns, his true and lawful attorney and attorneys irrevocably, for him, and in his name, &c. to demand, sue for, and receive from all and every person all sums of money which should thereafter be due and owing to the defendant, and all legacies and bequests coming to him or his then present or any future wife, &c.

The defendant continued to carry on the business of the mill till 1821, on the 11th of June in which year he retired, and on doing so delivered a bill of sale to the plaintiff, reciting that he owed the plaintiff 250*l.* and he thereby assigned to him all his goods, &c. in consideration thereof; and the plaintiff sold them, and paid over the proceeds to the bankers, in part discharge of their debt. The plaintiff also took possession of the mill, and worked it at a loss till January 1823, when the bankers, as mortgagees, took possession thereof, received the rents, and debited themselves therewith up to April 1834. The defendant being then indebted to them in more than 2,300*l.* they, with his consent in writing, sold the premises for the sum of 1,300*l.*

The bill then went on to state, that the debt to the bankers not being thereby paid, they still considered the plaintiff liable for the balance, then amounting to about 1,400*l.* and besides, the 1,500*l.* lent the defendant remained unpaid; that, shortly before 1838, the plaintiff found that the defendant had been bequeathed the interest for life of 700*l.* amounting to about 29*l.* 2*s.* and that in 1839, the defendant's wife had been bequeathed the interest of 200*l.* for life, amounting to about 8*l.*; and also certain residuary property, amounting to 1,118*l.*; and these several sums the plaintiff claimed to be entitled to by virtue of the deed-poll of the 7th of August, 1817. To take the case out of the Statute of Limitations, the plaintiff stated that certain payments were made to him in the years 1825 and 1828, by the bankers on behalf of the defendant, but whether in relation to this particular account did not appear; and that in 1839 the defendant wrote a letter to the executor, by whom one of the bequests was to be paid, in which he admitted the debt, and required to be furnished with a debtor and creditor account. In 1839, the plaintiff offered to take 20*l.* a year, or little more than half the income, together with half the residuary estate, in full of all demands, but the defendant refused to accept the offer, and the consequence was the institution of the present suit, which the plaintiff, being in reduced circumstances, was obliged to prosecute in form *paupe*ris.

The defendant, by his answer, admitted the principal facts, but denied that he owed the plaintiff the 250*l.* the consideration money for the bill of sale; and alleged that a partnership in the mill existed between him and the plaintiff from 1819 to 1821; and that, on his retiring, an arrangement was entered into between them, whereby the plaintiff agreed to take the premises, stock, goods, &c. and that from thenceforth all claims should be considered as liquidated, but that the agreement was not regularly drawn up, nor were the securities delivered to the defendant. Of this, however, there was no proof, and the plaintiff's evidence was entirely the other way. The defendant also insisted that, though a debt was originally due, and a liability incurred on the covenant to the bankers, they were now barred by time. He further insisted that the plaintiff was also barred; for as to the letter, though he admitted it was written, yet he denied it constituted an acknowledgment, as it was only written to ascertain what claims were set up against him; and, besides, it was to a third party. The deed-poll was inoperative, he insisted, as a conveyance of after-acquired legacies; and was also inoperative because of the arrangement of 1821, and was barred by time; and being made for valuable consideration, which was now extinguished, it might be revoked, and he did thereby revoke it. The interest of the 700*l.* he said, was given to his wife to her separate use.

The case came on several times to be heard, and as often stood over for compromise. After much negotiation, the difference between them was reduced to about 5*l.* down and 1*l.* 10*s.* a year; but neither party being willing to make further concession, the judgment of the Court became necessary.

Bagshaw (with him Rogers), for the plaintiff, insisted that by entering into the covenant to the bankers the plaintiff contracted a liability; and if the covenant continued, so did the debt, and therefore go also did the security given in respect of the debt. There was nothing in the nature of the deed of indemnity which rendered it inoperative, for agreements of the kind were often carried into effect. (Whitfield v. Fausset, 1 Ves. sen. 387; Wright v. Wright, 1 Ves. sen. 409; Hobson v. Trecoar, 2 P. Wms. 121; Beckley v. Newland, 2 P. Wms. 182.) The form of the deed-poll made no difference; for, being given as a security, it operates as an assignment in equity. The case of partnership set up was not proved. The plaintiff was entitled to the benefit of the deed-poll.

Kindersley (with him Lewin), for the defendant, insisted that the plaintiff was bound by the statute, as there had been no acknowledgment within twenty years, nor any part-payment, for even supposing the payments alleged had been made, they were not so made as to carry with them an admission that a larger debt was due. (Tippits v. Heane, 1 Cr. M. & R. 262; Mills v. Fowkes, 5 Bing. N. C. 455; Waugh v. Cope, 6 Mees. & Wels. 824; Holland v. Clarke, 1 Y. & Coll. C. C. 151; Phillips v. Phillips, 3 Hare, 299.)

Bagshawe, in reply.

THE MASTER of the ROLLS stated the facts down to the execution of the deed-poll, and then proceeded:—I find no evidence I can rely on that the defendant was ever afterwards asked by the plaintiff for payment of the debt, or that he ever paid interest upon it; and the bill to recover it was not filed till the year 1842, twenty-five years after. But in July 1817, the plaintiff's debt was postponed to that of the bankers; and in 1821 the plaintiff paid over the produce of the sales by him of the defendant's stock, goods, and effects to the bankers, in part-payment of their debt; and in 1823 the bankers took the mill into their own hands, and entered into possession thereof; and in 1834 they sold the same, and received the purchase-money, and applied the whole of it, after paying the expenses of the sale, in part discharge of the 1,620l. 18s. 5d. the debt due to themselves. Thus in 1834 the estate was exhausted, the trusts were fully executed, and the debt remained unpaid. At this time the plaintiff had a covenant from the defendant for payment of his debt; and also a deed-poll, whereby he was constituted an attorney for the defendant, to receive all such sum or sums of money, or other property, as the defendant or his wife should become entitled to by will or otherwise, and to apply the same in discharge of his debt. Whilst this trust was pending, and the execution of it incomplete, it cannot be maintained that time ran so as to bar the plaintiff's claims, but the covenant remained till the year 1834 unaffected by time. The bill was filed in October 1842, and it alleges that in 1838 the defendant received certain sums of money coming within the scope and operation of the deed-poll; and it prays that it may be declared that the plaintiff is entitled to such sums by virtue thereof; and that an account may be taken of what is due in respect of the debt to the plaintiff, and of his liability, and that such sums may be applied in payment thereof. The defendant set up a defence to the bill, and insisted that the deed-poll was inoperative as an assignment of after-acquired property, and was also barred by time. The deed-poll, however, is made for valuable consideration, and amounts to an assignment in equity of all sums to be received out of legacies thereafter bequeathed. I think the debt did subsist at the time of filing the bill, and that the deed-poll operated as an assignment of all such property as is mentioned therein for the payment of the debt. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to the benefit of the deed-poll.

Declare that the sums so bequeathed to the defendant belong to the plaintiff, and reserve further directions and costs.

VICE-CHANCELLOR WIGRAM'S COURT.

Monday, June 22.

BELCHAM v. PERCIVAL.

Answer—Production of documents—Privilege—Waiver of privilege.

The general rule which entitles a plaintiff to inspect all documents partially set out and referred to for greater certainty in an answer, does not apply to privileged documents.

A defendant may waive privilege, as to part of a privileged document, by setting such part in his answer, and referring to it, but his so doing does not waive the privilege as to the remainder.

This was a bill for an account, and the defendant, against whom the account was prayed, died before putting in his answer, intestate; his administratrix was made a party by supplemental bill, and in her answer admitted she had in her possession a draft answer to the original bill, which had been prepared for the intestate before his death, but it did not appear whether it had been engrossed, signed, or settled by counsel. The plaintiff then moved for the production of the draft answer admitted to be in her possession, which she opposed, and the Court refused to order it, on the ground of the document being privileged. The plaintiff now renewed the application for production of the draft answer, on the ground that the defendant, after setting out a part of the draft answer, in her own answer referred to the document itself for greater certainty, and thereby she had waived the benefit of privilege.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—It is perfectly settled that where a defendant in his answer states a document shortly and partially, and for the sake of greater caution refers to the document in order to show that the effect of the document has been accurately mentioned, in such a case the Court will order the document to be produced. Hardman v. Ellman, 2 Mylne & Keen, 732, and the cases there referred to, are an authority for that; but that rule only applies to documents in general, privileged documents do not come within the rule. It nowhere appears that a defendant, by setting out part of a privileged document, thereby loses his right to conceal the remainder; the act is voluntary on his part; and as to the part set out he waives the privilege, and so much the plaintiff is entitled to inspection, but no more; the plaintiff must, therefore, have leave to inspect the portion set out in the answer, and the defendant shall be at liberty to conceal the remainder.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

June 4 and 6.

BOWLEY v. BELL.

A employed B, a broker, to sell five shares in a railway. B contracted to sell them to C, another broker. At the time of the employment of B by A, and of the contract between B and C, the shares were in course of registration, and consequently no transfer took place. After considerable delay, and after the shares had risen in value, C wrote to B, threatening him that if the shares were not transferred, he, C, should buy a like number of shares in the market, at the increased price, and charge B with the difference of price. B gave notice of this threat to A, who distinctly forbade him from paying any money on his account. C afterwards fulfilled his threat, and B paid him the difference between the contract price and the then market price of the shares. By a rule of the stock exchange, to which B and C belonged, B was liable to make C this payment. No deed of transfer of the shares was ever tendered by C to B for execution, nor was the purchase-money ever tendered. Held, that B could not recover from A, as money paid to A's use, the money which B had paid to C as the difference between the prices of the shares at the two different times.

This was an action of assumpsit for money paid by the plaintiff to the use of the defendant, at his request.

Plea—Non assumpsit.

At the trial at the Lent Assizes, 1846, for the county of York, before Coleridge, J. a verdict was found for the plaintiff for 81l. 10s. subject to a leave reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for himself.

It appeared that the plaintiff was a share-broker at Hull, and the defendant a merchant residing at Newcastle, but also carrying on business at Hull. In the month of July, 1845, the defendant employed the plaintiff to sell five shares in the Great Grimsby and Sheffield Railway. The Act for the Great Grimsby and Sheffield Railway passed on the 26th June, 1845, and by it the Companies' Clauses Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16) and some other Acts were incorporated with it. The plaintiff negotiated a sale of the shares to Richardson, another share-broker, at Hull, but, at the time of the contract, the scrip shares were in the hands of the company for the purpose of registration, and no transfer of the shares took place. Some delay occurred in the registration, and the certificates were not given out by the company until the 12th of September. In August a call was made of 2l. 5s. per share, and a great deal of correspondence took place between the plaintiff and the defendant as to whether that call was to be paid by Richardson or by the defendant. On the 1st of September a meeting took place between the plaintiff and the defendant, at which the defendant signed the following memorandum, directed to the plaintiff:—

"On or before the 23rd instant, I undertake to pay a call of 2l. 5s. per share on five Great Grimsby and Sheffield Railway shares, sold by you on my account on the 28th of July last, and as soon after as possible pledge myself to execute the necessary transfer in respect thereof. The above to be repaid."

This memorandum bore no stamp, and was objected to as inadmissible in evidence. The call upon the shares was eventually paid by the defendant. No transfer of the shares took place, and upon the 18th of October, by which time they had risen considerably in value, Richardson wrote to the plaintiff that unless the shares were immediately transferred at the contract price, he should purchase five shares in the market, at the then market price, and hold the plaintiff liable for the difference. Upon the 22nd October the plaintiff communicated this notice to the defendant, who thereupon wrote the following letter to the plaintiff:—"I hereby caution you against paying any money on my account. I have received your notice of the 22nd. When the claim is settled in a court of law, I will pay it myself." Richardson subsequently bought five shares at an advanced price of 81l. 10s. and claimed that sum of the plaintiff. The plaintiff paid it, and now sued the defendant for it as money paid to his use. Both Richardson and the plaintiff were members of the Hull Stock Exchange, and it appeared that by a rule of the Stock Exchange at Hull, "all brokers are liable, if the principal be not named;" and, by the same rule, the plaintiff, under the above detailed circumstances, was liable to pay Richardson the sum in dispute. But there was no evidence that the rules of the Stock Exchange were known to the defendant; and indeed it was shewn that the Exchange itself was only founded in the previous March, and that the rules were framed somewhat later. No deed of transfer, in the form provided by schedule B to stat. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, was ever tendered by Richardson to the plaintiff, or by Richardson or the plaintiff to the defendant for execution; nor was there ever any direct waiver of such tender; but in the month of October, after some correspondence between the parties, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff, that as he was going from home he had placed the correspondence in the hands of his attorney, and requested that all further communications might be made to him.

In Easter Term, Channell, Serjt. obtained a rule, pursuant to leave reserved, or for a new trial, on the grounds that this form of action was not maintainable, but that the plaintiff should have declared specially; that, no deed of transfer having been tendered by Richardson, the plaintiff paid in his own wrong, and therefore could not recover of the defendant; that the agreement of the 1st of September was an agreement "the matter whereof was of the value of 20l." and therefore required a stamp; that the delay of Richardson in purchasing the shares was an unreasonable delay, and discharged the plaintiff and the defendant.

On Thursday, June 4, Byles, Serjt. (with him Archbold) shewed cause. Channell, Serjt. (with him Atherton) supported the rule.

On Saturday, June 6, TINDAL, C. J. delivered the judgment of the Court.

JUDGMENT.

In order to maintain this action for money paid to the use of the defendant at his request, it was necessary that the plaintiff should prove either an actual request on the part of the defendant, or that the money was paid in discharge of some liability, which the plaintiff had taken on himself, by the defendant's authority. No evidence was given of any actual request; it is, therefore, necessary to inquire whether the plaintiff paid to discharge some legal liability, and whether he incurred that liability by the defendant's authority. The precise nature of the contract which he entered into was not proved; but the evidence given by Richardson, on cross-examination, tends to shew that the contract was for registered shares. He says, "the shares were in for registration at the time I purchased. It was understood at the time of the bargain, between April and May, that the shares were then being registered." If the contract was for unregistered shares, it may be collected from the correspondence that the defendant did not authorize the plaintiff to make such a contract; and if he did make it, and thereby incurred the liability to have shares bought in against him, he cannot charge the defendant with the loss sustained. See the letters of the plaintiff to the defendant of the 11th of August, of the defendant to the plaintiff of the 15th of August, and of the plaintiff to the defendant of the 16th of August. Again, whatever was the form of the contract, it must be taken against the plaintiff that the purchase agreed to should be treated as a contract for registered shares; for, in answer to the defendant's letter of the 23rd of August, inquiring whether the contract was to be treated as void, the plaintiff answered, on the 27th, that Richardson would pay the contract price, and the amount of the call which had then been made, and which it would be necessary to pay in order to have a transfer of the shares after registration. The defendant thereupon paid the call, and nothing remained to be done but the execution of the transfer, which Richardson ought to have prepared and tendered for execution, together with the purchase-money; and until he did so he would not be in a situation to maintain an action for not transferring the shares; according to the case of Stephens v. De Medina, 4 Q.B. 422. No evidence was given of any further communication between the parties until the 15th of October, when the defendant wrote to the plaintiff, saying that as he was going from home he had placed the correspondence in the hands of his attorney, and requesting that all further communications might be made to him. This, it was said, amounted to a refusal to complete the contract, and dispensed with the tender of the transfer; but we think such meaning cannot be attributed to it, although the plaintiff, by paying the demands when the shares had been bought in by Richardson, as far as he was concerned, waived such tender. We think he clearly had no authority to do so after the defendant's letter expressly desiring him not to pay any money in his name as his agent. On the whole then, it appears to us, that if the contract was for unregistered shares the plaintiff was not authorized to make it; and if for registered shares, Richardson, not having tendered the transfer, was not in a situation to proceed against the plaintiff, and consequently payment by him was in his own wrong, and did not give him a right of action against the defendant for money paid to his use; and the rule for entering a nonsuit must, therefore, be made absolute.

Rule absolute accordingly.

Monday, June 29.

(Before Sir F. POLLOCK, C.B.)

SAMUEL v. ROBINSON.

The purchase of goods at an auction by an insane man is so far void as to exclude the liability of the auctioneer for the difference between the price obtained at that and a subsequent sale.

Assumpsit for money had and received, and on an account stated. Pleas, the general issue.

From the plaintiff's evidence, it appeared that the plaintiff had placed some goods into the hands of the defendant, an auctioneer, for sale,—that the sale by auction had taken place, and that the goods had been purchased by one M^r Keller, who had turned out to be an insane man. This sale not being perfected, the defendant kept the goods, which were resold, and fetched an inferior price. Subsequently, however, by some figures in pencil upon the bills which he sent to the plaintiff, the defendant debited himself with the difference between the price obtained at the first and subsequent sale, and for the amount of that difference the present action was brought. Several auctioneers stated that it was the custom of the trade that auctioneers should be liable for the amount obtained, even from a madman.

Chambers, Q.C. for the plaintiff, insisted that the defendant, according to the custom of the trade, was liable for the amount obtained at the first sale, especially as, by the conditions of sale, a deposit was to be paid upon each lot, which had not been done by M^r Keller. After a failure to pay his deposit upon the first lot purchased, he ought not to have been permitted to bid for a second lot. But if the plaintiff could not recover upon the first count, the defendant's liability upon the account stated was proved by the pencil figures upon the bills.

Jervis, Q.C. for the defendant, submitted that the purchase of an insane man was altogether void, and that, therefore, the price obtained by the second sale was all the plaintiff was entitled to receive.

The LORD CHIEF BARON directed the jury that if an insane man bought goods at a sale, a plea setting forth his insanity would be no answer to an action to recover the price—though, no doubt, the fact of insanity would influence a jury, and they would never give to a plaintiff, in such an action, more than the fair value of the goods, and not any higher price at which they might have been sold. But in the present case, the question was, whether the auctioneer was liable for the price at which the goods had been sold to an insane person; and, notwithstanding any asserted custom in the trade, he had no hesitation in saying that the auctioneer was not liable. The sale must be regarded as void and of none effect; and he agreed with the defendant's counsel, that on the first count the plaintiff could not recover. But on the count for an account stated, there was strong evidence to go to the jury in the shape of the pencil figures in the defendant's own hand-writing. If these were genuine, they amounted to an admission of the debt; and it was for the jury to say whether they were genuine or not.

Verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount claimed.

M. Chambers and Lush, for the plaintiff; J. Jervis and Phinn, for the defendant.

Quere also, whether costs can be annulled under that statute.

Trespass for false imprisonment.

Plea, not guilty by statute.

O'Malley (with whom was Crouch), proved, for the defendant, that he and another person named Gray were summoned on the 10th February, 1845, to appear before Mr. Dashwood, a justice of the peace for the county of Bucks, under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 29, s. 39, to answer the information and complaint of one Jos. Reeves, charging them with stealing one ash tree, of the value of 1s. the property of one E. F. Middleton. In pursuance of this summons, the plaintiff alone appeared on the day and at the time and place indicated therein; Mr. Dashwood, Mr. Newman, and another justice being then assembled at petty sessions.

When the case was called on, Mr. Dashwood was on the bench, but did not take any part in the proceedings which were conducted before Mr. Newman, who, having heard evidence, convicted the plaintiff in the following form:—

"County of } Be it remembered, that on the 21st

Tarry, of the parish of Hughendon, in the county of Bucks, is convicted before me, John Newman, esq. one of her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said county, for that he, the said Wm. Tarry, on the 9th of February, in the year aforesaid, at the parish of H. in the said county of Bucks, one ash tree, of the value of 1s. at the least, the property of E. F. M. Esq. then and there growing, unlawfully did steal, take and carry away, against the form of the stat. in such case made and provided. I, the said J. N. do therefore adjudge the said W. T. for the said offence (the same being his first offence) to forfeit and pay, over and above the value of the said tree so stolen as aforesaid, the sum of 5s. and for the value of the said tree so stolen as aforesaid, the further sum of 1s. and also to pay the sum of 1l. 4s. 6d. for costs, to be paid on or before the 19th day of March next, and in default of payment of the said sums, to be imprisoned in the House of Correction at Aylesbury, in and for the said county of Bucks, and there kept to hard labour for the space of one calendar month, unless the said sums shall be sooner paid; and I direct that the said sum of 5s. shall be paid to one of the overseers of the poor of the said parish, and in which the said offence was committed, to be by him applied according to the directions of the stat. in that case made and provided; and that the said sum of 1s. shall be paid to the said S. F. as the party aggrieved by the said offence, who has not been examined in proof of the same; and I do order that the sum of 1l. 4s. 6d. shall be immediately paid to Jos. Reeves, the complainant.

"Given under my hand and seal, the day and year first mentioned.

The plaintiff not being in a situation to pay the costs was committed to prison ultimately, under the following warrant of the defendant.

"County of Bucks, } To the constable of the parish to wit. } of Chipping Wycombe, in the county of Bucks; and to the keeper of the House of Correction at Aylesbury, in the said county.

Whereas Wm. Tarry, of the parish of Chipping Wycombe, in the said county, labourer, is convicted before me, John Newman, one of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the county of Bucks, upon the oath of J. Reeves and others, in the parish of Hughendon, in the said county, for that he the said William Tarry did, on the 9th of February last, at the parish of Hughendon, in the said county, steal, take and carry away one ash tree, from a certain place called Green Hill, in the parish of Hughendon, in the said county, then and there growing, of the value of 1s. the property of E. F. M. esq. contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided. And then I, the said justice, adjudged the said W. T. to forfeit and pay for his said offence (the same being his first offence) the sum of 5s. over and above the value of the article so stolen, as aforesaid, and for the value of the said article so stolen the sum of 1s. and also to pay the sum of 1l. 4s. 6d. for costs; and I directed that the said sum of 5s. should be paid to one of the overseers of the poor of the parish last aforesaid, in which the said offence was committed, to be by him appointed according to the directions of the statute in such case made and provided. And the said sum of 1s. to be paid to E. F. M. esq. the party aggrieved by the said offence, who was not examined in proof of the same, and that the said sum of 1l. 4s. 6d. for costs should be paid to the said J. R. the complainant. These are therefore to require you, the said constable, to apprehend and forthwith to convey the said W. T. to the said house of Correction at Aylesbury, in the county of Bucks, and deliver him to the keeper thereof, together with this precept. And you, the said keeper, are hereby commanded to receive the said W. T. into your custody in the said house of correction, there to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for the space of one calendar month, unless such sums as aforesaid shall be sooner paid and satisfied, and for your so doing this shall be your sufficient warrant.

"Given under my hand and seal, this 20th day of March, 1845. "JOHN NEWMAN." (L.S.)

Under these circumstances, O'Malley objected that the proceedings which terminated in the commitment of the plaintiff were irregular on several grounds. In the first place, the information and complaint were instituted before Mr. Dashwood, who issued his summons. He had, therefore, possession of the case, and the defendant had no jurisdiction over it at all. (Paley on Convictions, 3rd edition, p. 27; R. v. Saintsbury, 4 T. R. 456.) This depends on the 65th section, which enacts that "where any person shall be charged on the oath of a credible witness before any justice of the peace with any such offence, the justice may summon the person charged to appear at a time and place to be named in such summons, and if he shall not appear accordingly, then (on proof of the due service of such summons upon such person, by delivering the same to him personally, or by leaving the same at his usual place of abode), the justice may either proceed to hear and determine the case ex parte, or issue his warrant for apprehending such person and bringing him before himself or some other justice of the peace, or the justice before whom the charge shall be made may, if he shall so think fit, without any previous summons (unless where otherwise specially directed), issue such warrant; and the justice before whom the person charged shall appear to be brought, shall proceed to hear and determine the case." This does not authorize a different magistrate to proceed with the case where the party appears, but only when the magistrate issuing the summons shall have issued his warrant to compel the appearance of the party charged. Except in such a case no second magistrate can interfere; at all events, he could only do so when the summons was in the alternative, as the warrant may be. In the second place, the proceedings are defective, inasmuch as they ought to have been commenced on the information of the party aggrieved, or at his instance. The expression, "if known," in the 66th section is explained by the 41st section, which refers to the case where the party is unknown; and the inference from those sections, coupled with the 70th section, is that the object was in order to avoid the risk of collusion that the party aggrieved is required to be the party complaining. Then the information is irregular for not shewing the residence of the party aggrieved, and because, being directed to two parties, it does not any where appear what became of the other person; the Act only imposing a single fine for the offence created thereby. There are also objections to the conviction, which does not state to which of the overseers the penalty shall be paid; and is erroneous in according costs, for which there is no authority in the Act. It is further submitted, that the warrant is defective, first, because it states a conviction in the present tense, while the conviction gave a month for the payment of the fine and penalty; and it does not shew that the default took place after that time so given by the conviction. The warrant is also defective, for ordering the commitment of the plaintiff, in default of payment of the penalty, the value, and also the costs; whereas, admitting that there is any power to award costs, the plaintiff might purge his offence by paying the penalty and value at once. The defendant, however, had no power to order the payment of costs without disjoining them. The only Act which confers the power of awarding costs is 18 Geo. 3, c. 19; and that cannot aid the defendant, for the conviction and warrant do not affect to proceed on that Act. The warrant is also bad, for not shewing clearly that the defendant had jurisdiction as a justice of the peace in the county of Bucks, and for not reciting a conviction which would justify any imprisonment at all, there being no adjudication in it. For these reasons, it is submitted, that these proceedings are irregular, and that the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages.

The learned Judge then interfered, by recommending the parties to agree on a verdict, and to reserve the points for the Court above. To this they assented, and a verdict was thereupon taken for the plaintiff, with 5l. damages, by consent.

THE LEGISLATOR.

Summary.

THE changes in the Government have necessarily brought all legislative proceedings to a stand still. It is probable that nothing more will be done in the present Session, than to pass measures required by the exigencies of state; so the lawyers may look forward to a few months' respite from the hopes and fears by which they are alternately excited, through the proceedings alike of friends and foes at the commencement of every Parliamentary campaign. There is, however, no reason to expect that the recent changes will remove entirely all future cause for alarm. On the contrary, from every quarter there are warnings of contemplated invasions, which they would be wise not to disregard. The rival reports of the Lords Committee on the Burdens on Land indicated a settled opinion in both the great parties, that must, ere long, embody itself in the substantial form of actual legislation. The pending measures may, and probably will, perish and pass away; but only to be succeeded by others equally sweeping, perhaps more so. In the next Parliament, the lawyers will more need an active and intelligent representative, who thoroughly understands their requirements, than ever before; and it will be their own fault if they do not provide themselves with such a champion. Surely, they who procure seats for three-fourths of the House of Commons, could reserve one for a representative of their own.

EDUCATION (IRELAND).—Return of the number of meetings of the Board of Commissioners of Education, with the names of the commissioners attending each, in the years 1843 and 1845. There were nineteen meetings in 1844, and eighteen in 1845. The number of commissioners present at each was from two to five; excepting two of the last meetings of 1845, at one of which there were seven, and another ten commissioners present. During the two years, two schools, the Raphoe Royal School, and the Cavan Royal School, had been inspected; the cause assigned for the inspection, in both cases, being the apparent inefficiency of the schools. The result of the inspection is not stated. No schools of industry have been established by the commissioners in Ireland. The administration and course of instruction in the Diocesan schools are given in a tabular form. Seventeen such schools are enumerated, exclusive of that of Tuam, recently established. The course of education seems to include the ordinary courses of classics and mathematics usual at public schools; and, in some instances, modern languages; together with the lower branches of an English education. The number of pupils at each school varies from four to a hundred and twelve. There is a similar statement respecting the seven royal schools of Armagh, Banagher, Carysford, Cavan, Dungannon, Enniskillen, and Raphoe, in which the average number of pupils is rather higher. But, in nearly all these schools there seems to have been of late years a tendency to fall off in the number of pupils. The salaries of the Diocesan schoolmasters are, it appears, paid exclusively by the bishops and clergy of the Established Church; besides which, the dividends on about 1,000l. government 3½ per cent. stock, is paid by the commissioners to the masters of the Meath and Ardsagh District School, and a sum of 1,292l. was voted in 1838 by the grand jury of Limerick, towards the erection of a school-house for the district of Limerick, Killaloe, and Kilfenora.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.—A return made to the House of Commons by Mr. Tidd Pratt (obtained by Mr. Muntz, the member for Birmingham) shews the number of friendly societies certified by Mr. Tidd Pratt to the 2nd of April, including one for married women, called "Odd Fellows," or "Odd Women." The number of friendly societies certified to the 1st of January, 1836 (given in a former return), was 2,862, since which time to the 1st of January, 1841, by a similar return, the number was 4,321. Mr. Tidd Pratt had certified from the 1st of January, 1841, to the 2nd of April in the same year, 261. In the year 1842 the number was 743; in 1843, 924; in 1844, 979; in 1845, 1,250; and in the year ending on the 2nd ult. 1,049. Under the provisions of the 10th George 4, c. 56, the returns of the friendly societies enrolled since the 1st of January, 1841, are to be sent by the several clerks of the peace to the Secretary of State during the present month. Mr. Tidd Pratt states, that on reference to his books he did not find that on the 2nd of April, 1845, he certified the rules "for a set of married women calling themselves Odd Fellows," but he had an entry of the rules of a friendly society of "Odd Women," at Birmingham, for relief of members in sickness, with medical attendance, and the payment of a sum of money at death.

Bills in Progress.

JUDGMENT CREDITORS.—There is a Bill in the House of Lords (presented by Lord Brougham) to make creditors who have proved under process in bankruptcy and insolvency judgment creditors of bankrupts or insolvents. It is declared to be expedient to give additional remedies to creditors against debtors who, having been declared bankrupt or insolvent, do not account in a satisfactory way for such property as has been traced into their possession, or who have not kept such books as they ought to have done, or who have not continued to make the usual entries in their books up to the time of their bankruptcy or insolvency, or who may appear to have been guilty of great extravagance in their expenditure, or who may have put their creditors to unnecessary expense by vexatiously resisting proceedings taken against them by courts of justice for the recovery of debts, and who for these or any other reasons shall appear to the commissioner to be undeserving of protection. The Court of Bankruptcy may suspend or grant a protection. Assignees are to be considered judgment creditors, as also creditors who prove their debts. Property in the possession of a bankrupt or an insolvent unprotected may be seized for particular creditors.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

LEGAL APPOINTMENTS IN VAN DIEMAN'S LAND.
FRIDAY, June 26.—Lord BROUGHAM, seeing the noble Secretary for the Colonies in his place, begged to put to him the question of which he had given notice—namely, whether Mr. Macdonnell, who had been removed from the office of attorney-general in Van Dieman's Land, had been reinstated, or whether the emoluments of any other appointment he might have received were equivalent to those of the post he had occupied?—Lord LYTTELTON said the gentleman alluded to had filed the office of attorney-general in the colony since 1840, but in consequence of a dispute which he had had with the solicitor-general, his removal from that office had been recommended; but he had subsequently been appointed a commissioner of the insolvent court in the same place, which was a post of less importance.—Lord BROUGHAM regretted to hear that Mr. Macdonnell had been appointed to a situation in the same colony as that in which his conduct as attorney-general had given so much dissatisfaction. The noble lord referred to certain proceedings of Mr. Macdonnell while attorney-general in Van Dieman's Land, and gave notice that he would on Monday next move for a copy of Lord John Russell's dispatch on the subject.—Lord STANLEY said that that dispatch would show that Mr. Macdonnell had not been dismissed from his office as attorney-general for bad conduct, but merely because it had been found that the solicitor-general and he could not co-operate together. His strong impression was that no charge of corruption, dishonesty, or illegal conduct had been made against Mr. Macdonnell.

CHANGE OF VENUE, IRELAND.

Lord BROUGHAM said he now begged to lay on the table a bill of great importance to the good government of the sister kingdom. It was a measure for changing the venue in criminal prosecutions in Ireland, and was similar to the bill which he had introduced in 1843, and which he had only abandoned at the request of his noble and venerated friend opposite (the Duke of Wellington). He would now lay it on the table without discussion.—Bill accordingly laid on the table.

THE ROYAL ASSENT.

The royal assent was given by commission, with the usual forms, to the Corn Importation Bill, the Customs Duties Bill, the Explosive Substances Bill, and to sixty-one private Bills, among which were the London and York and the Direct Portsmouth Railway Bills.—The Lords Commissioners were the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Buccleuch, the Earl of Hadlington, and the Earl of Dalhousie.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY.—A proposal made by Mr. Serjeant Manning to the Lord Chancellor for the amendment of the law of bankruptcy and insolvency has just been made public in a parliamentary paper printed by order of the House of Commons. The document, which extends to nearly 50 folio pages, contains a good deal of interesting matter on the two systems, with practical suggestions for improvement. It would seem to be the opinion of the learned serjeant (in which opinion several experienced men concur) that there should be only one system of insolvency, which should be distinct from that of bankruptcy. Several laws are now in force on insolvency, two having reference to non-discharge ment and another to imprisonment. Whilst an insolvent debtor can petition the Court of Bankruptcy out of prison, an insolvent cannot petition the Insolvent Debtors' Court until he is in prison. Mr. Serjeant Manning takes a very comprehensive view of the system of insolvency, and urges the necessity of making the subsequently acquired property of a debtor subservient to the payment of his debts. There has existed a good deal of false compassion on this point, and men have asked why a man should be crippled in his future exertions from a knowledge that he is expected to consider the creditors from whose claims his person had been discharged. The learned serjeant places the matter in a very clear light before his lordship. "It would appear that considerable sums annually accrue to creditors in the Insolvent Debtors' Court, from legacies and other subsequently acquired property, in a manner that does not paralyse the debtor, or interfere with his getting an honest livelihood, or oblige him to do any thing more than that which a correct view of his position would induce him to do voluntarily. In addition to what is obtained for creditors through the direct intervention of the Insolvent Debtors' Court, credit should be given to the course thus adopted with respect to after-acquired property for all payments which are made out of Court, in consequence of its being known to the debtor that he can be compelled to pay. The amount is believed to be considerable. Instead of an equal distribution, however, the after-acquired property is too frequently made the subject of unjust preference or of partial coercion, which it is now proposed to put an end to. All this is reversed under the English Bankrupt Law. Few cases are recorded in which the certificated bankrupt has come forward to pay his debts, and where this has occurred, that which in truth is a mere act of restitution has been treated as an act of great generosity. This appears to be one of the cases in which a particular course of legislation long pursued has created a feeling in favour of the propriety and the justice of that course. The practice is assumed to be just, because it is understood to be legal. It is the tendency of the day, and more or less of all times, rather to sympathise with the present inconvenience suffered by the delinquent than with the less prominent, the less immediate sufferings of the innocent victims of his crime. Were this matter, however, to be now the subject of legislation for the first time, I think that the present system would find no support, at any rate that it would receive none from the persons of education, of station, and of high principle, who now step forward as its advocates. A man who contracts a debt contracts to pay the 20s. in the pound which he has obtained from his creditor. On what principle should a court be invested with the power of telling the debtor that as soon as he has performed a fraction of his contract—a part only of that for which he has received a full consideration, he is released from any liability to perform the remainder, whatever his subsequent ability may be? Yet such is the language which now for more than a century has been held in English Courts of Bankruptcy. This boon is not, however, held out to any but the trading classes of the community, nor even can it be reached by those classes, except where the interposition of a creditor or creditors, to whom the trader is indebted to a certain amount, can be obtained." There are materials now supplied from which a practical hand could mould a bill.

THE MAGISTRATE.

SUMMARY.

THIS has been the week for holding the County Quarter Sessions, and, so far as we have been enabled as yet to learn, the business has been generally light. The criminal courts have exhibited a gratifying decrease in the amount of crime, and the appeal courts a less pleasing (to the lawyers), but equally obvious, decrease of parochial litigation. It is remarkable, too, that, of the appeals heard, at least four-fifths are upon technical grounds, and not upon the merits, proving either the imperfection of our legislation or the over-strictness of the judges. When leisure permits, we purpose to present to our readers a résumé of the present state of the law (or, we should rather say, of the cases) relating to the Practice of Removals,—we mean, of the decisions upon the technicalities, which are now so numerous, and often so contradictory, that the practitioner experiences the utmost difficulty in learning what he may, and what he may not, do.

We are pleased to observe that at many of the recent sessions the chairmen expressed themselves in strong terms as to the necessity for Houses of Refuge for discharged prisoners.

This is no new topic to the readers of the LAW TIMES. It was here mooted more than two years since, and those remarks were the means of stimulating various localities to successful efforts for the accomplishment of the benevolent design. Among the most energetic of these appeals was that by Mr. ROGERS, Q.C. the Recorder of Exeter, who enforced his argument by some striking illustrations, which appeared to tell upon his audience, and will, it is to be hoped, produce a movement for the purpose among the inhabitants of that city. Still we must repeat our conviction that a provision for discharged prisoners is as much the duty of the Government as the provision of gaols. It is too serious a matter to be left to the chance operations of private benevolence. It is as incumbent upon the State to prevent crime as to punish it, and such a refuge is a preventive of crime. But it may be anticipated that this will be one of the many questions of social improvement which must occupy the attention of any government for some years to come.

The occurrence of the Quarter Sessions reminds us of an inconvenience, against which repeated objection has been made here. The County Quarter Sessions are held on fixed days; but the City and Borough Sessions are held just when it suits the caprice or convenience of the Recorders. The consequence is, that practitioners, and persons having business there, but non-resident, are ignorant when their presence will be necessary. This is a matter which really requires some regulation; and certainly the least the authorities of the cities and boroughs can do is, to announce the times of holding their Sessions, when those at a distance, but having business there, may readily find them, as in the LAW TIMES, and not to confine the advertisement, as now, to the local papers. Many boroughs have adopted this course, but many more have not done so. Perhaps if the Profession in each city or borough having a Quarter Sessions would notify the propriety of the plan to the authorities, the example would be generally followed.

REVIEW OF MAGISTRATES' CASES.

Decided during Easter Term and vacation, and Trinity Term and vacation.

WITH the exception of the decisions upon the construction of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 36, as to the rating of Literary Institutions, and upon the forms of convictions under the Masters' and Servants' Act, there have not been many important cases during the last two Terms. The tendency of this branch of the law is to excessive refinement and technical objections, almost inappreciable from their minuteness, as will be seen from some of those mentioned in the following summary.

In noticing Reg. v. Justices of Surrey, supra, 6, 221, we considered that the construction of 9 Geo. 1, c. 7, was established to be, that where there was not sufficient notice of appeal, the Sessions were bound to respite. This point, if at all doubtful before, has been again decided in Reg. v. Recorder and Justices of London, 7 Law T. 226. The Sessions had there refused to hear an appeal which had been respite from January Sessions to April Sessions, on the ground that the appeal should have been tried at the January Sessions. The Court made a rule for a mandamus to enter continuances, and hear the appeal absolute, thereby confirming the view taken in Reg. v. Shropshire (Justices), 7 East, 549. We may here mention, as an instance of the extreme minuteness of objections which unfortunately the Justices at Quarter Sessions sometimes hold to be fatal, that in Reg. v. Justices of Middlesex, 7 Law T. 117, a rule for a mandamus was made absolute to hear an appeal which had been refused, because the appellants, in describing the order, had made a mistake in the name of one of the justices, in consequence of the bad and illegible manner in which he had written his signature.

APPRENTICESHIP.

Parish apprentices.—Mode of binding.—Two points have been raised and decided as to the forms to be observed in the binding of parish apprentices, under 56 Geo. 3, c. 139. In Reg. v. Inhabitants of Holme, 7 Law T. 204, it was objected that the second section requiring notice to the overseers of the parish in which the child was to serve the apprenticeship was not complied with, when it appeared that notice to one only had been given. The Court, however, overruled the objection, the general rule being, that notice to one of a body acting under a joint authority is notice to all. (Reg. v. Warwickshire, 6 A. & E. 873; Reg. v. Staffordshire, 4 A. & E. 842.) The other point was equally minute; viz. that an allowance by justices, under that Act, should show in itself the jurisdiction of the justices who signed it. This also was overruled, because the allowance being upon the indenture, and signed by justices of the same name as those named in the indenture, stating that it was signed as the Act required before the execution of the deed by any of the parties, it was to be presumed that the allowance was in fact signed by the same justices who had made the order, and within their jurisdiction.

Imperfect Apprenticeship.—A contract of living and service is not to be construed as an imperfect apprenticeship, because there is an incidental clause in the agreement, that a person in the employment of the master should receive a certain sum per week for superintending and instructing the parties hired when there is no distinct contract on the part of the master to teach, or no remedy given to them if they were not taught. (Reg. v. North Hovan, 7 Law T. 183.) The general object of the agreement is to be looked at, and in the principal case it was clear that that was hiring and service, and not apprenticeship.

ATTORNEYS.

Exclusive Audience of the Bar.—The question which has been some time pending at the Denbigh Quarter Sessions, as to the power of the Court to refuse to hear attorneys when there is a sufficient number of barristers present, has at length been settled in favour of the bar. (Re the Justices of Denbighshire, 7 Law T. 256.) A rule nisi, for a certiorari to bring up an order of the Sessions, directing, that when four barristers were present attorneys should not be heard, was at once refused. Lord Denman said, and we think most truly, that it is necessary for the interests of all parties that there should be privileged orders in courts of justice,—a body intervening between the judges and the suitors or their attorneys. We believe it to be equally advantageous to the attorneys themselves, that there should be this division of labour, and are glad that the so generally understood rule has now received judicial confirmation.

CERTIORARI.

When to be moved for.—If the six months allowed by 13 Geo. 2, c. 18, for removing proceedings in the Court below, have elapsed before the application for the writ, the Court will not grant it, unless by the consent of all parties, although, in fact, application would have been made in time to a judge at chambers, but for the unexpected absence of the judge. (Reg. v. Justices of Anglessea, 7 Law T. 67; see Reg. v. Blosam, 1 A. & E. 386.)

How issued.—The conflict of opinion in the two books of Crown Practice, by Mr. ARCHBOLD and Mr. CORNER, as to the issuing a writ of certiorari, in vacation, where no case has been granted, has been decided in favour of the view taken by Mr. ARCHBOLD, in the case of Reg. v. Newton Ferrers, 7 Law T. 203. The Court said that if Reg. v. Chipping Sudbury, 3 N. & M. 164, was correctly reported, it was wrongly decided, and held, that a judge's order for a writ of certiorari, to remove an order of Sessions, confirming an order of removal, may be granted, ex parte, in the first instance, though a case has not been granted, and the writ issue in vacation. E. W.

CRIMINAL LAW.

The following is the Second Report "to the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, in her High Court of Chancery," of the Criminal Law Commissioners:—

"We, your Majesty's Commissioners, appointed by your Majesty's commission, bearing date the 22nd day of February, in the eighth year of your Majesty's reign, in presenting our second report to your Majesty, humbly beg to observe that by the original commission issued by his late Majesty, certain commissioners therein named were required 'to digest into one statute all the statutes and enactments touching crimes, and the trial and punishment thereof; and also to digest into one other statute all the provisions of the common or unwritten law touching the same, and to inquire and report how far it may be expedient to combine both those statutes into one body of the criminal law, repealing all other statutory provisions; or, how far it may be expedient to pass into a law the first-mentioned only of the said statutes, and generally to inquire and report how far it may be expedient to consolidate the other branches of the existing statute law, or any of them. The former commission having expired upon the demise of the Crown, your Majesty was graciously pleased to issue a new commission in the same terms as that issued by his late Majesty.

"Under these two commissions the Commissioners, having considered the matters referred to them, gave their opinion in favour of the utility of framing a digest of the criminal law, and stated various arguments in support of their views on the subject. They also presented a complete digest of the criminal law. In framing this digest the Commissioners, in several instances, judged it expedient not to present the existing provisions of the law, but certain modifications thereof, of which they deemed the advantage to be manifest. And they, moreover, suggested various other modifications of the existing law, which they thought were proper to be made, but which they did not think fit to introduce into their digest, on account of the limited nature of their authority.

"Your present Commissioners have proceeded to execute the enlarged powers of the present commission, by which they are directed not simply to digest the law in its present state, but, also, in consolidating its provisions, to put into a form suitable for being passed by the Legislature such modifications of the actual law as they judge expedient to submit for the adoption of Parliament.

"They entirely agree with the Commissioners acting under the preceding commissions in their opinion regarding the importance of framing a digest of the criminal law. The propriety of rendering that law more accessible to the community, they think, cannot admit of doubt. An ascertained text will also afford more easy means of future alteration, whereby the inconveniences of the law may be rectified, and it may be adapted to meet new circumstances and exigencies, without impairing the uniformity of the system. As to which point it is observable, that a great number of the definitions and punishments of offences have been enacted in statutes, passed at different periods, without due regard to the general principles of the law, or the consistency of particular provisions. It is conceived, also, that judicial magistrates will be greatly assisted by having an authentic and systematic text of the law to which they can refer, though, in the application of it to particular cases, considerable scope must always remain for the exercise of judgment and explanatory exposition (as is now the case), by those entrusted with its administration. With respect to the mode in which future additions to, and alterations of, the law may be made, your Commissioners concur in opinion with the preceding Commissioners, that it would be desirable that such alterations and additions should be notified to the public by means of the Gazette, or some other official document, and that at the end of some fixed period, e. g. three years, they should, by the authority of Parliament, be embodied in the digest. On this subject, however, and that, generally, of the utility of a digest of the criminal law, your Commissioners beg to refer more particularly to the reports of the preceding Commissioners.

"Your Commissioners concur in general with the modifications of the existing law adopted or suggested by the preceding Commissioners; they think, also, that some further modifications are essential, in order to render the criminal law of the country suitable to the present state of society, and conformable to enlightened principles of jurisprudence. A simple digest of the actual law, without any modification, would, they apprehend, exhibit many imperfections, which, it cannot be doubted, it must be thought highly expedient to remove.

"Without adverting to all the defects in various branches of the existing law, or anticipating at length what will be more particularly considered in the course of this report, it must surely be deemed expedient to modify several of the present provisions of the law concerning accessories after the fact—the justifications and extenuations of homicide—the protection of officers of law whilst engaged in the execution of warrants or other legal process,—maritime coercion,—the punishment of accidental injuries without reference to the intention or the probable consequences of actions,—that relic of barbarism, the law of mayhem,—besides several other existing provisions, of which modifications are submitted in the present report.

"On some matters, though we do not feel entire confidence in our recommendations, we conceive that advantage may arise from submitting enactments founded on our opinions, the rejection of which, if unapproved of, will not be attended with any material delay or inconvenience; and the task of reducing into a statutory form the will of the Legislature, when it is ascertained, as regards any alterations, cannot occupy considerable time. Of matters of this latter description, the new provisions submitted by your Commissioners on the law regarding duels are offered with great hesitation, not so much on account of doubts entertained by the Commissioners, as because it is a subject deeply affecting the interests of society, and upon which public opinion is much divided.

"As the modifications of the existing law proposed by the former and your present Commissioners occasionally affect principles of the deepest importance and most extensive influence, their consideration has necessarily occasioned much research and consultation, and has consumed much longer time than if the labours of your Commissioners had been confined simply to forming a digest of statutes, the principles laid down in text writers of authority, and the decisions applicable to the subjects treated of in the present report.

"In their present report, your Commissioners humbly submit to your Majesty the draft of a bill, framed in a shape to be passed by the Legislature, for the purpose of consolidating all the provisions of law as modified by your Commissioners regarding the general matters treated of in the preliminary chapter of the schedule to that bill, and the definitions and punishments of the offence of homicide and other offences against the person. To particular articles of the schedule notes are appended, indicating where the existing law has been modified, and the nature of the particular modification; and the bill and schedule, without notes, are again given in the appendix. Where the subjects to which the articles relate have been discussed by the previous Commissioners, references have been given to the reports in which those discussions are contained; and, where it has been thought necessary, the sentiments of the present Commissioners, in reference to the proposed modifications, have been expressed.

"Although your Commissioners have lost no time in submitting this portion of their labours to your Majesty, and have, in pursuance of the authority under which they act, framed the draft of the bill now submitted to your Majesty, they submit that it will not be expedient to pass such bill into a law before the whole digest is completed. For it is obvious that, in order to secure entire uniformity of principle and arrangement, it is very expedient that the Commissioners should have examined the whole subject, as well the part relating to procedure, as that regarding the substantive law. Much of useful generalization may thus also be effected, tending materially to render the digest more accessible and intelligible. It can scarcely fail to happen, that any one chapter of the digest may be rendered more precise and unobjectionable in every respect after the Commissioners shall have diligently scrutinized and reduced into proper articles all the other chapters; and until the views of the Commissioners, with reference to the mutual dependency of the several chapters and their general arrangement, shall be fully developed by the completion of the work, it is very probable that erroneous judgments may be formed of the practical operation and sufficiency of detached parts."

CRIMINAL JUSTICE IN FRANCE.—The Moniteur of Wednesday, the 24th ult. publishes a report on the administration of criminal justice in France, in 1844, addressed to the King by the Keeper of the Seals. According to that document, the Court of Assizes decided, during that year, on 5,379 accusations, comprising 7,195 accused—1,612 relating to crimes against persons, and 3,767 against property. As compared with the population, the average number of accused was 1 to 4,757 inhabitants. One species of crime against persons presented a constant and considerable increase during the 19 last years—namely, rapes on children. Between 1826 and 1830, only 139 individuals charged with that crime were annually tried, whilst in 1844 their number had nearly trebled, being 406. The number of cases of rape on adults, which had likewise increased, although in a smaller proportion, until 1843, reverted in 1844 to what it was between 1826 and 1830. The accused of perjury and infanticide were more numerous from 1836 to 1844 than they were in the previous period of ten years. The average of persons accused of murder was the same as during that period, and the cases of manslaughter had considerably diminished. Amongst the crimes against property, those that increased most were coinage, forgery, fraudulent bankruptcy, incendiarism, and domestic robberies. The proportion of highway robberies was the same, but that of other robberies had undergone a considerable reduction; after rising on an average to 3,296 from 1826 to 1830, to 3,045 from 1831 to 1840, they fell from this last year to 1844 to 2,478. Of the 7,195 accused brought to trial in 1844, 5,898 were males and 1,297 females. There was but one female tried at the assizes of the Departments of the Drome, Lower Pyrenees, and Upper Loire; two in the Aude, and three in the Upper Alps, Isère, and Tarn et Garonne. In the Department of the Seine, however, the proportion was 21 per cent.; in the Upper Saône, and Loire-et-Cher, 29 per cent.; and 31 per cent. and 32 per cent. in the Finisterre and Côtes du Nord. In 1844, out of every 1,000 accused, 171 were under 21 years of age, 220 were aged from 21 to 30 years, 246 from 30 to 40, 162 from 40 to 50, 62 from 50 to 60, and 39 above 60. Of the 7,195 accused, 4,011 were unmarried, 2,826 were married; 2,212 of the latter had children, 614 had none, and 358 were widowers and widows, of whom 279 had children and 79 had none. 1,061 of those accused lived in idleness, although destitute of means of existence, 2,405 were occupied in field labour, 1,952 in mechanical pursuits, 486 were engaged in trade, 261 were carriers of goods, 1,545, innkeepers, lodgers, &c. 544 servants, 346 followed liberal professions; 3,761 could neither read nor write, 2,399 could read only, or read and wrote imperfectly, 885 read and wrote correctly, and 250 had received some education. Of the 5,379 accusations, 1,402 were entirely rejected by the jury, and 2,870 fully admitted; 2,555 against all the accused, and 315 against a portion only; finally, 1,107 accusations were admitted with certain modifications, which in 494 cases left to the facts their criminal character, and converted them in 623 others into mere offences; 2,290 accused were acquitted, 4,871 condemned; 34 children under 16 years of age, declared to have acted without discernment, were acquitted; 2,823 persons were sentenced to correctional penalties; 2,296 to upwards of a year's imprisonment, 521 to less than a year, and 6 to fine; 827 were condemned to seclusion, 961 to hard labour during a certain period, 209 for life, and 51 to death. Of the latter 41 were executed, the penalty of 9 was commuted, and 1 died after his appeal had been rejected by the Court of Cassation. The jury had brought in a verdict of "extenuating circumstances" in favour of 2,877 of the persons found guilty; 431 only out of the 1,997 sentenced to be publicly exposed were pilloried. The courts of correctional police passed judgment, in 1844, in 152,462 cases, comprising 500,184 persons—162,062 males, and 38,132 females. The tribunals of simple police, called upon to decide on slight infractions of regulations for public security and salubrity, gave their decision in 223,745 cases, comprising 291,962 accused, or 40,633 more than in 1843. The general list of the jury, in 1844, included 251,681 citizens. The number of suicides in that year was inferior by 47 to that of 1843—it still amounted to 2,973, of which 541 were committed in the department of the Seine. 2,197 of the persons who destroyed themselves were males, and 776 females; 20 males and 7 females were under 16 years of age; 145 from 16 to 31; 461, from 31 to 40; 1,169, from 40 to 50; 464, from 50 to 60; 417, from 60 to 70; 164, from 70 to 80; and 39, upwards of 80. 1,009 put an end to their existence by hanging, 999 by drowning, and 213 by the vapour of charcoal. Of these 153 belonged to the department of the Seine. One-fourth of the persons who committed suicide in 1844 laboured under affections of the brain.

THE LAWYER.

Summary.

THE legal changes consequent upon the resignation of the Ministry are, of course, the all-absorbing topic in the legal world. At the moment of writing this we are not in possession of any decisive intelligence. Should the new appointments be ascertained before we go to press, they shall be added.

The retirement of the late Lord Chancellor will not be regretted by the Profession. His great natural abilities were unfortunately of late years eclipsed by growing indolence; and seldom, perhaps, has the vast patronage of that office been dispensed with more of favouritism. The return of Lord COTTENHAM will be hailed with pleasure by the Profession, irrespective of party, as restoring to them the ablest living equity lawyer. His retirement gave the first impulse to the opinion, now almost universal, that the functions of the judge and the politician ought to be separated, and that Lord Chancellors should not be changed with the shiftings of party.

The Bankruptcy Amendment was, on the motion of Lord BROUGHAM, read in the House of Lords a third time, and passed, last evening.

NOTES ON NEW CASES IN EQUITY AND CONVEYANCING.

No. I.

SHEPHERD v. MOULS (4 Hare, 500).

The liability of trustees for neglect in investing the trust funds where a discretion as to the investment is reserved to them.

T. Shepherd, by his will, dated in 1829, gave to J. Hannan and W. Moul, their executors, &c. a portion of his personal estate upon trust to sell and convert it into money, and to be possessed of such money upon trust to pay debts, &c. and to raise a sum, the yearly produce of which, when invested, would amount to 100*l.* and to invest the said money in the public funds, or at interest upon Government or real securities in England, and (with the consent of his wife during her widowhood) to vary the securities, &c. and pay the annual produce to his wife and her assigns for life, or during her widowhood; and in case of her marriage, to pay her an annuity of 50*l.* for life, and the trust-moneys above dealt with then to fall into the residue of his personal estate. And as to the residue of the moneys which should come into the hands of the said trustees, or, &c. and which should remain after answering the said trusts, the testator directed that the said trustees should invest the same upon such stocks, funds, or securities as aforesaid, and alter and vary the said stocks, &c. as they should think reasonable. And the testator declared the trusts of the said moneys, &c. (subject to the annuity to the wife) for the benefit of his six children. Until the trust-moneys, &c. should vest absolutely in some person under the trusts, the trustees were to lay out the same, at compound interest, for the benefit of those entitled under the trusts. The will contained the usual clauses for the indemnity of the trustees in respect of other than their own defaults, and Hannan and Moulds were appointed executors.

The executors possessed themselves of the personal estate, but instead of investing the residue according to the trusts of the will, one of them (Hannan) was permitted by the widow, and some of the parties ultimately interested therein, with the privity of the other executor, to retain the whole residuary funds at 4*l.* per cent. interest. Hannan became bankrupt, and the bill was filed by some of the residuary legatees against Moulds, Hannan, and his assignees, and the parties who had concurred in the breach of trust, for the administration of the estate, praying that the executors might be charged with what they had received, or with what, without their wilful neglect or default, they might have received. At the hearing, the plaintiffs asked for a reference to the Master, to inquire at what time the executors had possessed assets of the testator which might have been invested according to the directions of the will, and what was the average price of Consols at such times. The defendant Moulds resisting this inquiry, the case was argued at length, and

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (Wigram) decided, that the trustees could not be charged with the amount of stock which they might have purchased with the trust-moneys, at the time when such moneys were in their hands for investment, but were merely liable for the amount of money which they had actually received, with interest. He argued, "The discretion given to the trustees, to select an investment among several securities, makes it impossible to ascertain the amount of the loss (if any) which has arisen to the trust-fund from the omission to invest, except, perhaps, in the possible case (which has not occurred here) of a particular security having been offered to the trustees in conformity with the terms of the trust. Suppose the trustees were directed to invest moneys either in the funds or in the purchase of lands; there would, at a subsequent time, be no better reason for saying that the trustees ought to have made the investment in the funds, than that they ought to have purchased land. Unless some reason can be shown why the trustees should at any given moment have chosen one kind of investment rather than another, it seems impossible to say there has been a default by the trustees in not having made a particular investment, or what has been the definite loss to the trust-funds from the omission so to do. In this case I see no greater reason for saying that the trustees were bound to invest the trust-moneys on Government security, unless a real security had presented itself, than for saying that they were bound to invest the same moneys in real estate, unless a security in stock had been offered at a given price. The breach of trust is in having made no proper investment, not in having omitted to choose the one rather than the other." Having briefly referred to the conflicting authorities (which are mentioned in the note), his Honour proceeded—"I cannot see upon what principle the Court is to charge the trustees with an accidental improvement in value of one of several securities, where they are not bound, in the execution of the trust, to select that particular security rather than another. It is much to be regretted that there should be any difference of opinion in the decisions upon a point of this nature, but I am unable to arrive at a conclusion which would have the effect of charging this trustee with the specific loss resulting from an act not having been done, which particular act the trustees were not, in the execution of their trust, imperatively bound to do. The case is very different from giving the cestui que trust the option of electing between the interest and the profit which a trustee may have made. In one case the Court pursues the actual consequences of the breach of trust; in the other, by going beyond the recovery of the trust moneys and interest, the Court must proceed on grounds purely hypothetical.

In endeavouring to ascertain the liability of a trustee, in consequence of the breach of his particular trust, it becomes material to consider the rules which prevail with regard to those trusts of which his neglect or defiance is one of many varieties of violation. For this purpose let us see what are the primary rules in relation to the breach of that common class of trusts which impose upon the trustee the duty of investing money in one or more specified securities. First, there is the very ordinary case of a trustee, who is bound, by the terms of his trust, to invest the money in a given security, as in the public funds, retaining the money in his own hands, and committing a breach of his trust by non-investment: or, where he does not retain it in his own hands, but invests it in some security, or deals with it in a manner, not authorized by the trust. In such cases there is no doubt as to the extent of the trustee's liability. "Where trustees are bound by the terms of their trust to invest the money in the public funds, and instead of doing so retain the money in their hands, the cestui que trust may elect to charge them either with the amount of the money, or with the amount of the stock which they might have purchased." (Per Wigram, V. C. in the above case.) "An executor, if he will take upon himself to act with regard to the testator's property in any other manner than his trust requires, puts himself in this situation—that he cannot possibly be a gainer by it: any gain must be for the benefit of his cestui que trust." (Per Lord Alvanley, M. R. Piety v. Stace, 4 Ves. 622.) And secondly, the very large, class of cases of which Shepherd v. Moulds is an instance varies from those just named, only in this respect,—that the terms of the trust, instead of specifying absolutely and conclusively the particular security in which the money is to be invested, leave some discretion in the hands of the trustees, and give them the power of selecting one out of two or more securities mentioned, for the purpose of investment. What is the extent of the trustee's liability for a breach of such a trust is a question less easy to be answered, and its difficulty, we fear, will be increased rather than removed by the decision of V. C. Wigram.

It is, however, with great diffidence, submitted, that as increased strictness has of recent years been applied to the conduct of trustees (see 2 Story's Eq. Jur. 480, et seq.), the severer rule will ultimately be applied, and they will be held chargeable, not merely with the amount of money received, but with the value of that security, which they might have obtained, most favourable to the cestui que trust. The authorities upon the point are indeed conflicting, but the balance undoubtedly seems to lean in favour of the stricter rule,—a balance, we venture to think, not even overturned by the judgment above given. In Marsh v. Hunter (6 Madd. 295), where the trust was to invest in stock, or on real security, and where the trustees lent on personal security, Sir John Leach, it is true, decided, that they were liable only for the principal money, and not for the value of the stock which might have been purchased. But several cases have followed that decision, in all of which an opposite conclusion has been arrived at. Such are Hockley v. Bantock, 1 Russ. 141; Dimes v. Scott, 4 Russ. 195; Watts v. Girdlestone, 6 Beav. 188; and Asses v. Parkinson, 7 Beav. 379, 385. The latter of these cases was not cited in Shepherd v. Moulds, and at the time was probably not reported. In it Lord Langdale adheres, without hesitation, to his former opinion. After consideration, he says, "I have examined the authorities cited in argument in this case, but I have not found any thing to cause me to alter the opinion which I have already expressed. Upon consideration, I retain the opinion I expressed in Watts v. Girdlestone, and think that case was rightly decided. The trustees had a discretion to exercise. They might, at their option, have invested the money in the funds; and if the value had risen or fallen, they would have been safe, for they would have exercised their discretion according to the directions of the trust. But they did not exercise the discretion at all; and the question is, whether the cestui que trust has not a right to complain of the omission, and to be placed in the situation in which he could have been, if the trustees had not neglected to exercise the discretion reposed in them." Ubi supra; see also Byrchall v. Bradford, 6 Madd. 235; Harrison v. Harrison, 2 Atk. 121; Powlett v. Herbert, 1 Ves. 297; Pocock v. Reddington, 5 Ves. 794; Bostock v. Blakeney, 2 Bro. C.C. 653; Dute v. Scales, 12 Ves. 402, as confirming the same view. This conflict of authorities justifies a reference to principle, even on our part; and the principle applicable to such cases undoubtedly is, not only that the trustee shall receive no benefit, nor a possibility of benefit, but that the cestui que trust shall lose no benefit, from the breach of trust; and it is obvious, that the cestui que trust would (under the doctrine of Marsh v. Hunter), in many cases lose a benefit which he might have received, had the trustee, in the exercise of his discretion, selected the security which turns out to be the best. And against a man who has committed a clear and decided breach of trust, is the assumption an unreasonable or unjust one, that, had he discharged his duty at all, he would have exercised a sound discretion, and selected the (ultimately) best security? There seems something like a confusion of idea—or a trick of words—in the argument that, because there are two things, one or other of which he may do, at no given moment is he called upon to do either. His duty is to do one or other; but, neglecting both, can he plead the one against the other? Can he justify his omission to do one by an assertion that he might have done the other? The breach of trust is positive, and the severer rule ought surely to be acted upon against the breaker. Mr. Pemberton, arguendo, said, in Hockley v. Bantock, "Though the executors had an option to invest the money either in the funds or on mortgage, yet, as they did neither of the two things, either of which they might with propriety have done, and one or other of which it was their duty to do, the cestui que trust have now a right to say, 'you have committed a breach of trust; and for that breach of trust you shall be answerable, not in the way which may be most convenient for you, but upon the principle which shall be most beneficial to us.' Such is the universal rule, applicable to every case of breach of trust. Where a trustee employs the trust-money in business, he may be made to account, not merely for interest at five per cent. but for the profits of the trade; though it could in no case be his duty to invest the fund so as to produce more than legal interest. Not having lent out the money on mortgage, these defendants had no other alternative, except that of purchasing stock. Stock, however, has not been purchased, and the plaintiffs will hereafter have a right, if they think proper, to call upon the Court to compel the executors to place them in the same situation as if stock had been bought." (1 Russ. 143.) Upon the whole, it must be questioned whether Shepherd v. Moulds will be considered conclusive upon this important point.

Upon the general duty and liability of trustees, with respect to the investment of trust-moneys, see Lewis on the Law of Trusts and Trustees, c. 16, s. 3, pp. 305 to 316; and note (f) p. 313, vol. 4, of Martin's Conveyancing, by Davidson, tit. "Settlements," where all the cases are very neatly put together. J. W. B.

PROMOTIONS, APPOINTMENTS, ETC.

(Clerks of the Peace for Counties, Cities, and Boroughs will oblige by regularly forwarding the names and addresses of all new Magistrates who may qualify.)

The Queen has been pleased to direct letters patent to be passed under the Great Seal, granting the dignities of Viscount and Earl of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland unto the Right Hon. Lord Francis Egerton, and the heirs male of his body lawfully begotten, by the names, styles, and titles of Viscount Brackley, of Brackley, in the county of Northampton, and Earl of Ellesmere, of Ellesmere, in the county of Salop.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint Charles Phillips, esq. barrister-at-law, to be one of the Commissioners for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors, in the room of David Pollock, esq. appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Judicature at Bombay. Mr. Phillips is expected shortly to take his seat. Mr. Perry, the Lord Chancellor's secretary, has been appointed District Commissioner of Liverpool, in the room of Mr. Commissioner Phillips, who has returned to town. It is expected that Mr. Phillips will sit at the remaining places on the Northern Circuit, and that Mr. Commissioner Pollock, now on that circuit, will resign, and proceed to Bombay as Chief Justice.

The Queen has been pleased to grant unto William Alexander Anthony Archibald Hamilton Douglas, esq. (commonly called Marquis of Douglas and Clydesdale), the office of Knight Marishall of Scotland, in the room of William George Earl of Errol, deceased.

The Queen has also been pleased to direct letters patent to be passed under the Great Seal, granting the dignity of a Baronet of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to the following gentlemen, and the respective heirs male of their bodies lawfully begotten, viz.:—The Right Hon. Thomas Frankland Lewis, of Harpton-count, in the county of Radnor; John Somerset Pakington, of Westwood-park, in the county of Worcester, esq.; John Gladstone, of Fasque and Balfour, in the county of Kincardine, esq.; James Weir Hogg, of Upper Grosvenor-street, in the county of Middlesex, esq.; William Feilden, of Fensicowles, in the county palatine of Lancaster, esq.; William Verner, of Verner's-bridge, in the county of Armagh, and of Inismagh, in the county of Tyrone, esq.; and Sir Moses Montefiore, of East Cliffe-lodge, in the Isle of Thanet, and county of Kent, Knight.

The Lord Chancellor has appointed William Sweet, of the city of Bristol, gent. to be a Master Extraordinary in the High Court of Chancery.

SOLICITOR OF EXCISE.—It was stated a short time since, and the matter was looked upon as a certainty, that Mr. Douglas, the barrister, would be the successor to Sir Francis Doyle (promoted to the office of Receiver General of Customs), in the solicitorship of Excise. Such, however, now turns out not to be the fact, for on Thursday morning a messenger arrived from the Treasury, bearing the official notice to the Commissioners of Excise, and conferring the appointment upon Mr. Bateman, LL.D. the chief clerk in that establishment. Dr. Bateman has for a great number of years devoted himself to the study of the excise laws, and is the author and compiler of the "Compendium of Excise Acts," which is the chief book of reference by the commissioners. This appointment is honourable to all parties.—Morning Herald.

The Morning Chronicle of Friday states, that Sir Thomas Wilde will of course be Attorney-General. The Solicitor-General, it is thought, will be either Mr. Jervis or Mr. Romilly.

The Irish Chancellorship will not, it is said, be filled for the present; but the seals will be put in commission. Mr. Pigot will, according to this rumour, continue for the present to watch the legal conduct of Irish business in the House of Commons, without, however, holding office. There appears to be no doubt that Mr. Baron Brady will be the next Chancellor, and will be succeeded as Chief Baron by Mr. Pigot. It is supposed that Mr. Moore and Mr. Monaghan will be the new Irish Attorney and Solicitor-General.

The Attorney-General has appointed Walter Hassey, Griffith, esq. crown prosecutor on the Home Circuit, in the room of the late Jonathan David Clarke, esq. Q.C.

Charles Coates, esq. and — Mockler, esq. have been appointed assistant crown prosecutors for the county and city of Kilkenny.

NEW LEGAL APPOINTMENTS.—It is confidently stated that the following legal appointments will be made by the new ministry:—The Lord Chief Baron Brady to be Lord Chancellor; the Right Hon. D. R. Pigott, Q.C. who was Attorney-General under the last Whig administration, to be Chief Baron; the Right Hon. Richard Moore, Q.C. to be Attorney-General; James H. Monahan, esq. Q.C. to be Solicitor-General; Mr. Hatchell, Q.C. to have the first vacant serjeantcy.

Upon the motion of Joseph Napier, esq. Q.C. seconded by Joseph Radcliffe, esq. Q.C. it was resolved unanimously, that the meeting was of opinion that the members of the Bar should attend the Quarter Sessions Courts; and for the purpose of carrying out that measure, each Circuit should form a Sessions Bar.

LEGAL INTELLIGENCE.THE SHERIFFS' BANQUET TO THE JUDGES, &c.

The sheriffs of London and Middlesex, Messrs. Chaplin and Laurie, entertained the judges and members of the Bar with a whitebait dinner, on Wednesday last, at the Crown and Sceptre, Greenwich. The Lord Mayor having kindly granted the use of the city barge, the greater portion of the company assembled at Blackfriars-pier, at half-past four o'clock, the hour fixed for embarkation. Among the judges who had accepted the sheriffs' invitation, and who also availed themselves of the opportunity of water transit, were the Lord Chief Justice Denman, the Vice-Chancellor, Mr. Baron Alderson, Mr. Justice Patteson, Mr. Justice Colman, Mr. Justice Erle, and Mr. Justice Wightman. The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, and upwards of twenty members of the Court of Aldermen, the sheriffs elect, and several leading members of the Bar, and other distinguished guests, were also on board the barge. The party arrived at Greenwich at half-past five o'clock. The banquet was of the most recherché description, every delicacy both in and out of season covering the table. After the usual loyal toasts had been duly responded to, Mr. Sheriff Laurie rose to propose the health of the Lord Mayor. The worthy sheriff, in the course of his remarks, alluded to the fact of the banquet at which they were then assembled taking place on the banks of their own magnificent river, instead of, as heretofore, within the confined limits of some one of the corporation halls. He flattered himself, from the very full attendance of her Majesty's judges, and other distinguished persons whom he saw around, that the change was considered an agreeable one. (A very general assent from the whole company followed this remark.) The Lord Mayor having responded to the toast, Mr. Sheriff Chaplin proposed the health of Lord Chief Justice Denman, and of the other judges who had honoured himself and his worthy colleague with their presence. Lord Denman duly acknowledged the compliment, and proposed the health of the sheriffs who had so worthily fulfilled the duties of their high office during the past year. The sheriffs severally returned thanks. The "Members of the Bar," the "Members for the City," "the Visitors," and other toasts having been given, and duly honoured, the party broke up about nine o'clock, returning to town by the city barge, which, it need scarcely be added, was plentifully stocked with champagne and other choice wines.

PROCLAMATIONS OF OUTLAWRY.—Wednesday being the first day of the quarter sessions for the county of Middlesex, the names of the following persons were, pursuant to the proclamation of outlawry issued against them, posted at the sessions-house, Clerkenwell:—William Cunningham Burton, late of Bath's Hotel, Piccadilly; J. A. Udney, late of 44, Lower Grosvenor-street; J. L. Wellesley, of Limer's Hotel, Conduit-street, Bond-street; James William Newcombe, of 4, Gloucester-street, Dorset-square; Richard Augustus Seymour, of 28, St. John's-wood-terrace, St. John's-wood; Lady Frances Twysden, late of Kensington; W. H. Gardiner, of Twickenham; William Frederick Byng, of Bury-street, St. James's; William Bailey, of Arabella-row, Pimlico; John Taysden, no specified place of residence; Fanny Stultz, widow, of 9, Gloster-place, Kentish-town; Thomas Gotobed, of Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury; Henry Lacey, of 23, York-street, Portman-square; Mary Ann Berryman, of Arundel-street, Strand; J. W. Gudge, of 31, Burton-street, Belgrave-square; and Douglas Kinnaird Wiggins, otherwise Charles Douglas Kinnaird, known as the Honourable Douglas Kinnaird Pulteney, of the Colonnade, Haymarket.

NEW WAY OF RECOVERING DEBTS.—Last week the constables of the L division were required to remove a mob of persons assembled near the Archbishop of Canterbury's palace, in consequence of a man walking backward and forward opposite the house by the water side, with the following inscription printed on a board:—"I am waiting here to be paid the sum of 1l. 13s. 6d. for one dozen of wine, or else have the bottles returned." On the board was also mentioned the name of the party opposite whose house the man was parading. The debt was understood to have been paid, and the mob dispersed.

NEW MONEY ORDER OFFICES.—An order has been issued at the General Post-office, that, on and after the 6th instant, offices will be opened for the granting and cashing orders at the undermentioned places:—Alcester, Warwickshire; Colne, Lancashire; Cranbourne, Dorsetshire; Crew, Cheshire; Machynletts, Monmouthshire; Nunlton, Warwickshire; Southwell, Nottinghamshire.

There is not a single prisoner for trial at the Cambridge sessions, which commenced yesterday. So remarkable a circumstance never before occurred. —Bury Post.

SUGAR.—An account showing the quantities of Sugar of the several sorts imported into the United Kingdom, and the quantities retained for actual consumption within the United Kingdom; together with the rates of duty charged on the home consumption, and the net revenue accruing therefrom, in each year, from 1816 to 1840, inclusive; followed by a comparative statement of the average prices of British Plantation and Foreign Plantation Sugar for the same series of years. This very complete and useful return was originally moved for by Mr. Baring, when Chancellor of the Exchequer under the Whig administration in May 1841, and during the debates on the sugar duties which took place at that period. The present is merely a reprint, moved for by Mr. Goulburn. We understand, however, that another return, embracing the five years which have since elapsed, is in preparation, which we shall abstract fully on its appearance.

PROCEEDINGS OF LAW SOCIETIES.SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW.*REPORT OF THE COUNCIL.

In presenting their second annual report, the council of the society congratulate you on the progress the society has made. Our present meeting may in fact be considered as our first anniversary; for the society is not yet eighteen months old, and when we last met, under the name of an annual meeting, it was scarcely constituted. We did, however, even at that early date, anticipate the result to which we have now the gratification of drawing your attention; for we felt strong conviction that the principles and objects of our institution, once understood, could not fail to attract that attention which we deem their importance to deserve. We did not, it is true, look forward to that sudden accession of members, or that rapid accumulation of subscriptions, which has so frequently marked the progress of associations formed for the furtherance of some directly benevolent or other attractive object; for though we are inferior to none in the importance of the end we seek, we must admit that it must be pursued through rough and uninviting ways. The impressions we have to produce are of slow growth, requiring much time for their maturity, yet more for the ascertaining of their true value. We cannot seek to attract you by recreation. —Diversity of labour is admitted to be a species of rest; but the labours to which we invite bear too near an analogy to your daily and professional pursuits to be classed as diversions. Come and work—come and teach—come and learn—are not among the invitations which meet the readiest acceptance. And yet we have succeeded.

We have the satisfaction of stating that the list of new members, admitted by ballot, since the last annual meeting, has nearly equalled the number of original members. Our recruits have indeed been principally from the ranks of the law; but we are not without indications that a more extended view of our object will shortly attract to us persons from other professions, callings, and stations, and that many distinguished members of the legislature will connect themselves with an institution which, without encroaching on the functions of Parliament, is calculated to facilitate its labours. Many of our senior members have manifested their willingness to open their stores of knowledge; and the juniors have shown no inconsiderable alacrity in taking advantage of their communications. We always looked forward to this combination as one of the many advantages of this Society.

The list of our ordinary members has suffered little diminution—we have to congratulate ourselves on the removal of Mr. Justice Erle and Mr. Baron Platt from the number of ordinary, to that of honorary members, in consequence of their elevation to the bench; in which class also the Chief Baron of the Exchequer has been enrolled. We have, on the other hand, to regret the loss of some amiable and learned colleagues—the sudden death of Mr. Deval deprived the Profession of a most learned member, and the cause of Law Reform (especially as regarding the laws of real property) of an effective advocate. By the no less sudden death of Mr. Commissioner Merivale, an amiable man, and very elegant scholar, was lost to society; nor can social intercourse be mentioned, without missing at once the good humour, wit, and spirit of Sir Charles Williams.

Consequent on the increase of members, the committee of management will have to report an improved state of your finances; and though they are not yet sufficient to afford an extensive outlay in printing, without which, both the progress of our labours, and their publicity when completed, must be naturally impeded, we are not without hope, that a further improvement in our income may enable us to be more liberal in this branch, and that without the necessity of resorting to any appeal to the public for pecuniary assistance. On this head there has been some difference of opinion in our Council; for while some members have contended, and with good reason, that for a public purpose of such permanent importance as the amendment of the law, we are well entitled to call on society for those contributions, which are always forthcoming in aid of objects of general utility; others have been unwilling to resort to this appeal, till they had exhausted their own resources; or at least till the amount of labour performed with our confined means, should serve as a basis for calculating the greater benefit which would result from a larger outlay.

To this end, it becomes necessary to advert to the work already completed—to that which is still in progress—and to the probability that some of our suggestions may be adopted by individual members of parliament, and that others may be deemed worthy of the notice of the government, and may thus ultimately obtain the sanction of the legislature. By the constitution of this society, the duty of preparing reports on various subjects, proposed in the first instance by any individual member, who will enter his doubts or suggestions in the Rough Journal, and then selected for reference by the Council, devolves on the various committees of the society, in which committee every member is at liberty to enrol himself. Of these committees there were originally ten, several of which have been already in active operation, and have presented reports, marked by the learning, discrimination, research, and judgment which might be expected from those who assisted in the debate of the subjects or (which is yet more important) drew up the result of the deliberations.

One of the earliest of these reports was made by the Parliamentary Committee, to which it was referred "to consider the propriety of establishing a board for revising and settling public bills in Parliament." This report, with the sanction of the society, was communicated by your president to Sir Robert Peel, as Prime Minister, as well as to the Lord Chancellor; and the council have reason to believe that the recommendation is under the consideration of the government.

The importance of some such measure as is here recommended becomes more and more apparent in every session of Parliament; as in every session, political and financial questions, and an overwhelming mass of business connected with public or private speculation, occupy more and more, and jurisprudential measures, less and less of the legislative attention. We have seen that bills for the amendment of the law are usually postponed to so late a period, that lengthened discussion upon them becomes impossible, and that they are either hastily thrown out, or passed in so crude and imperfect a state, that a year seldom elapses before "An Act to amend an Act," or "An Act to amend an Act intitled an Act to amend an Act," bears testimony to the imperfection of our legislative machinery. Large views of law reform are but seldom taken—a patch here and a patch there, as insulated evils or inconveniences are occasionally discovered, is all that can be expected; and the maxim of Lord Bacon, "that it is easier to change many things than one," seems to be utterly forgotten.

A responsible board for the preparation of bills would obviate much of this evil; and your Council is the more anxious to press upon your attention, and, through you, upon the attention of those with whom you are in communication on such subjects, as they consider it a main, if not an indispensable, condition to all sound amendment. Neither is there so much novelty, as may at first appear, in this proposition. It has been a constant practice to issue Commissions of Inquiry on various subjects, deemed too extensive for the consideration of a parliamentary committee, and the reports of such commissions have been followed by bills in conformity, or supposed conformity, with their recommendations: but as the commission does not continue to follow the bills through their several stages of parliamentary progress, it often happens that a small, and sometimes casual, deviation from the original plan totally alters the measure, and that so mischievously, that the supposed authors have felt it necessary to their reputation to repudiate the transformed or deformed offspring.

The Committee on Equity has been very diligently engaged on the several matters referred to them; and their labours have been facilitated by the liberal use of his chambers afforded for their sittings by Mr. Spence; a similar accommodation has also been given by Mr. Koe to the Debtor and Creditor Committee.

The first report made by the Equity Committee was on a reference, made to them in common with most of the other committees, "To consider the expediency of relieving the suitor from the expense of the judicial establishment, and of placing this burden on the general revenue of the country." We have to regret that no other committee has yet made a report on the subject, since it is one which cannot well be debated on any single branch of judicature, without reference to its bearings on many others. The next report was on the reference to consider "whether any safe and effectual means can be adopted for the taking of the accounts of executors and administrators, and the distribution of the personal estate of testators and intestates in any case; so as to diminish the expense which is at present incurred in attaining these objects." This report, presented on the 11th inst. is still under the consideration of the society. We therefore make no further comment on it than to say that it relates to a subject of every day's occurrence, and bears ample marks of the learning and diligence of those who have prepared it.

The Common Law Committee have made a very elaborate and valuable report on the subject of documentary evidence; it has met with the approbation of the society, and its recommendations are already embodied in a Bill now pending before Parliament.

We have the gratification of making a similar statement as to two reports of the Committee on the Law of Property. In pursuance of the recommendations contained in these reports, Bills to facilitate the conveyance of real property and the granting of leases, and for superseding the necessity of assigning outstanding terms, have been introduced in the present session.

The Committee on the Law of Property has also presented valuable Reports on the following references:—"Whether the appointment of new trustees should not vest the trust property in them, and whether the deed of conveyance or assignment might not be dispensed with." The principle recommended in this Report has been adopted in a Bill introduced by the Lord Chancellor for regulating Charitable Trusts. This Committee has also presented reports on the following references:—"Whether any facilities can be adopted for appointing new trustees in cases in which there is no power in the instrument, or the power is defective, or cannot be exercised;" and "Whether it be possible and expedient to adapt the machinery of the public funds to the transfer of real property;" and also on the draft of a Bill for amending the Transfer of Property Act, privately communicated to the Committee.

The Committee on the Law of Debtor and Creditor has had many meetings on the several subjects referred to them; subjects which include not only the whole law of bankruptcy and insolvency, but the yet more important and intricate question of commercial and general credit. With so large a field before them, we cannot be surprised that they have not yet come to the conclusion of their labours. Festinus lente is never so sound a motto as when it relates to interference with the varying transactions of a great trading community.

In addition to the subjects on which reports have been presented, many other questions have been referred to the several committees, and are now under consideration, and in various stages of progress.

The formation of a library has not proceeded as favourably as we anticipated; for, though a few members have presented their works, and some facility has been afforded us in obtaining parliamentary papers, we still fall short of even the beginning of such a collection as the uses of the society would require.

In conclusion, the council trust that the society will agree with them, that, considering the difficulties which were likely to beset an association of this novel nature, it has met with all due encouragement, and has already proved itself competent to deal with the varied and important subjects which obviously come within its range.

The extent of its utility cannot, however, be ascertained by a transient view, various as are the questions already before it. Interesting as are the inquiries already instituted, important as are the objects already attained, or within reasonable hope of attainment, they fall infinitely short of the multiplicity of objects which the future may disclose to us. As inquiry proceeds, fresh fields of usefulness open themselves, fresh prospects arise. By the aid of our association, sound opinions may be formed and diffused, rash and inexpedient alterations in the law discussed and prevented, professional opinion ascertained and collected, and general assistance given to the gradual improvement of the law.

THE THIRD ANNUAL REPORT OF THE COUNCIL.

Your council have now for the third time to report to the Society their views of its state and prospects.

Our numbers have continued to increase. In our last annual report, though we were able to announce a considerable accession of members, we were obliged to add, that our recruits were principally from the ranks of the law: however much we were pleased at lawyers joining us who were willing to aid us, still we felt that our labours would be comparatively fruitless unless we received that support which the community at large alone can give. This year we are happy to state that we have also been joined by many members of both Houses of Parliament, and by many other gentlemen belonging to the mercantile and other classes of the community.

In the last year death has deprived us of two eminent members, the late Earl Spencer and Mr. Justice Story, the one ever ready to promote any useful public object with his influence, and purse, the other a man whose legal writings have acquired for him an European reputation. We notice with pleasure that one of our ordinary members, Mr. Burge, has been appointed to fill the office of Commissioner of the Leeds Court of Bankruptcy, an office in the due performance of which we take the greater interest, because it is one of those offices which we owe to the progress of Law Amendment. In losing Earl Spencer we have to regret the loss of a vice-president. The increasing importance of the Society, as evidenced by the number of Peers of Parliament who have joined it, has induced the council to recommend that we should not merely fill up the vacancy thus occasioned, but increase the number of vice-presidents.

The Society has also enlarged the sphere of its exertions. They have called in the public to sanction and approve of their proceedings, and in that appeal they have been completely successful. At a public meeting held on the 6th of June instant, composed of many eminent and learned persons, as well members of this Society as persons not yet enrolled, resolutions in favour of its establishment and objects were unanimously passed.

It will be now our duty shortly to recapitulate the proceedings of the Society since our last report. We have the satisfaction of stating that the machinery of the Society has worked well. The plan of referring suggestions to particular committees competent to entertain them, which committees report on them to the general body, where they are again discussed, has proved well adapted to afford opportunities both for careful and extensive consideration and inquiry.

Inquiry indeed is the great object of the Society. It may be a humble one, but your council submit that it is of unquestionable use that inquiry should precede and accompany all changes in the law, and that correct information as to them should be diffused.

The Committee on the Law of Property has proceeded with its useful and successful labours, and to this committee, for its zeal and devotion to the cause, your council feel that especial praise is due. The Bills for rendering the assignment of satisfied terms unnecessary and facilitating the conveyance of property, which were founded on their reports, have passed into a law. The first of these has been accepted both by the Profession and the public as a great improvement. It has removed a source of great delay and expense, (the latter having been calculated as amounting to 200,000*l.* a year,) and has done much to simplify the title to land, while its security has been in no way diminished.

By the Acts relating to deeds an effectual blow, as we believe, has been struck at awarding professional remuneration according to the length of the instrument, and something has also been done to shorten particular classes of deeds. Your council have also observed with pleasure that the principle of these Acts has been adopted and recognized by her Majesty's Government in a Bill introduced in the present session for facilitating the granting of leases in Ireland. These Acts must also be taken as a legislative expression of opinion, that the Profession should exert themselves in every possible way to cheapen and simplify the necessary dealings between man and man connected with real property.

This opinion has been subsequently and more emphatically expressed by the report of a select committee of the House of Lords on the burdens upon land, a document which has justly received the greatest attention, and is entitled to the greatest weight, as expressing the unanimous opinion of all parties in that branch of the Legislature of "the necessity of a thorough revision of the whole subject of conveyancing, and the disuse of the present prolix, expensive, and vexatious system."¹

As this opinion was similar to that expressed by this Society from its commencement, we cannot but consider the Lords' report as a remarkable confirmation of our views, and (we trust we may add without presumption) some proof of the benefit which has already attended the diffusion of our reports and proceedings.

Your council is now watching with great interest the progress of the "Bill for further facilitating the Conveyance of Property," which stands for a third reading in the House of Lords, without one dissenting voice having been yet expressed. This Bill is a further adoption of the recommendations of the Society. Your council also invite attention to the other reports which have proceeded in the present session from this committee, more especially to those "On the Law of Mortgages," "On the Law of Uses and Trusts," and the two reports "On the establishment of a General Registry of Deeds." We believe that in these reports, and in those previously submitted to the Society, are to be found suggestions of the utmost importance; and that by following them out carefully and gradually, the community will be able to obtain, 1. A more ready mode of investing money on the mortgage of lands, which will be equally advantageous both to the borrower and the lender; 2. The shortening and cheapening the deeds relating to the transfer of lands; and 3. The simplification of the title to land, and more especially, the reduction of the delay and expense now attending a retrospective investigation of title.

We believe that these measures will be a great advantage to all branches of the public, and more especially to the landed interest, and the trading and mercantile interest. We also consider that a great social benefit will be conferred on the community if the number of small holders of land can be increased, and small capitalists be induced to invest their savings in land. Neither can we possibly believe that changes which will greatly facilitate all legal dealings with land, which will bring about a much larger and more rapid investment of capital in land, which will engage in legal transactions of this nature a much wider circle of the community, can in any way injure the legal Profession. We cannot think that the practical exclusion of the great mass of the people from taking any interest in the transactions of conveyancing is beneficial to any class, but least of all is it so to that class whose peculiar business it is to assist and prepare them. Your council, therefore, have the fullest confidence, that in recommending and furthering measures which improve and simplify the law, and facilitate to the utmost the alienation of property, they are the true friends of professional interests. Lawyers for the most part ourselves, we consider that the maintenance of the Profession of the law in an honourable and prosperous state in all its branches, is beneficial not only to the lawyer but to his client. Your council are desirous that the Society should act in harmony with the feelings and interests of the Profession; and we believe that these are in this case, as in most others, identical with those of the community at large.

The Equity Committee is entitled to praise for much assiduous attention to the subjects referred to them. They have presented a report recommending the establishment of a Court of Trusts, with a view to creating a system of public trusts, and thus superseding the necessity, if parties so please, of appointing private trustees. Your council have reason to suppose that a Bill will be brought in with the view rather of having the principle of a Public Trustee considered, than of attempting to pass any measure of this sort in the present session. This committee has devoted much time to the subject of the delays in the Master's offices. The committee have anxiously considered this important and difficult subject, and we look with hope and confidence to their ultimately suggesting a plan which may remedy this long-admitted grievance.

A useful report from the Common Law Committee for rendering the law uniform in all cases of actions brought against persons acting in pursuance of public Acts of Parliament has been received, and a Bill founded on it has been introduced, and will probably become law in the present session.

The Criminal Law Committee has presented two very valuable reports, one of which recommends for adoption the plan of Captain Moconochie, for the management of transported and other criminals; and the other reports in favour of submitting to the jurisdiction of the Petty Sessions unaggravated larcenies of small amount. Both these reports were the fruit of great consideration and discussion; and we believe that much benefit in the diffusion of sound information has already resulted from them.

Your council have the satisfaction of stating, that the income of the Society exceeds its present expenditure. We are desirous that, in conformity with the approved practice of almost all other societies, we should endeavour to obtain as extensive a diffusion as possible of the reports and proceedings of the Society. Having considered whether we should establish a separate publication for this purpose, or avail ourselves of any existing publication, we have come to the conclusion, that it would be both cheaper and more advantageous in the first instance to avail ourselves of an existing publication, if a suitable one could be found willing to forward the views of the Society. We have now much pleasure in announcing, that we have been able to make an arrangement with the publishers of the Law Review, (which has from its commencement promoted objects similar to those of the Society,) by means of which the reports and proceedings of the Society will be regularly published, and a more permanent record of the proceedings of the Society be obtained. According to this arrangement, the members of the Society will henceforth be presented with the Law Review, commencing with the current volume of that work. Our present resources have enabled us to do this. But the larger the funds are which are placed at our disposal, the more shall we be enabled, by the diffusion of sound information, to promote the objects of the Society.

In conclusion, your council think that the present position of the Society is a subject of high congratulation; that its progress has been as rapid as the most sanguine could have reasonably expected; that its members may hope for a long and useful continuance of its labours; and that the Society has already effected much permanent good, and has laid a broad foundation for effecting much more. We wish particularly to impress on the Society, that this must mainly depend on the accession to our ranks of the young. They must carry out what we only are able to project; and to their industry and energy the council look chiefly for the labour necessary for the completion of all great and useful undertakings.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CONVEYANCE STAMPS.

SIR,—Your correspondent, "An Old Subscriber" (June 22, 1846) must surely be, beyond measure, scrupulous in regard to the stamp-duty on deeds prepared under the new Act to facilitate (?) conveyances. (a) He fears that, although his deed under that Act should contain less than thirty folios, yet that the progressive duty would be chargeable as if the long forms of col. 2 were inserted.

Now the fact is that (certain dicta to the contrary notwithstanding) the Stamp Act makes no progressive charge except upon the words actually contained in any deed, &c. and the facilitating Act, though declaring that deeds made in pursuance thereof shall be construed as if the forms of words in col. 2 were inserted therein, not only does not cause those words to be contained in the deed, but absolutely excludes them therefrom; substituting effect for language, and construction in lieu of contents; inasmuch that, to render the Stamp Act applicable, it would be requisite that the latter should expressly charge not only the words actually contained but those construed as contained in any deed, &c. and for this purpose "An Old Subscriber" may rest satisfied that a new Stamp Act would be indispensable.

As to section 3 charging the deed with the combined lease and release duties, it is scarcely requisite to observe that stamp-duties are not payable by inference; there must be an express, aye, and an explicit enactment, otherwise there is no duty. This clause leaves the release progressive duty chargeable as it previously was, on the words contained in, and not on the meaning to be drawn from, a given deed.

Your correspondent asks "Is our Law Institution deficient?" To which I should say, yes, verily, from the time of the famous, or, rather, infamous affair of the salaries and compensations.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.

ANOTHER OLD SUBSCRIBER.

June 29, 1846.

FEES IN REVENUE PROSECUTIONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—I am clerk to the justices acting in and for this borough. Many informations are here exhibited for offences against the revenue laws, at the instance of the Commissioners of the Customs and Excise, and in each case a fee of 1l. 1s. used to be paid for examinations, hearing, &c.; but for some years past such fee has been refused, and I have charged strictly according to Lord John Russell's Table of Fees to be taken in Boroughs. Recently I have received from the collector at this port a note, of which the following is a copy:—

"I submit that the clerk to the justices may be requested to state under what authority the charges for examinations and commitments are made, as it would appear that the usual charges in those instances are, 1s. each taking examinations, and 1s. 6d. each for commitments."

"JOHN RUTHERFORD.

"To the Collector and Comptroller at Dover, as submitted, by order of the Commissioners."

Now I should be glad to be informed, through the medium of your valuable journal, by other gentlemen who are in a similar position to myself, what fees they are paid on the like occasions?

I am, Sir, yours, &c.

Dover, July 1, 1846. MATTHEW KENNETT.

(a) This stupid Act, in its first clause, speaks of the forms in the first schedule thereto, which schedule contains but one form, and the latter is put forward as a specimen of a short conveyance without any enactment of its sufficiency; nay, the words therein, "in pursuance of an Act to facilitate the Conveyance of Real Property," are actually adapted to mislead the practitioner into a belief that this reference to the Act will suffice, without an enactment to that effect, they would probably fail to do so; as they seem not to refer with more particularity to the Act in question than to the previous Lease and Release Act, or that of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 105.

All these Acts presuppose that, in the case of a release founded on a lease for a year, the latter must necessarily be a lease answering to the instruments under the head "Bargain and Sale (or lease) for a year," whereas an actual lease for a year, made irrespective of the purpose of enabling the lessee to take a release, were, nevertheless, equally good whereon to found a release, whilst the duty on such lease would be governed by its premium or rent, and might be anything from 10s. to 1,000l.; yet these statutes profess to retain a "lease for a year" duty as a thing definite and certain! It is fairly to be presumed that the judges would, in all cases under these Acts, deem the lowest possible lease duty (10s.) to be sufficient.

RECOVERY OF AGENCY ACCOUNTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—I am induced to reply to the query of "An Attorney" at Preston, in your number of the 20th June, relative to the recovery of an account for agency (under 40s.) from a Solicitor in a large town in Yorkshire, because your correspondent subscribing himself "Ebor," whose reply is inserted in your last number, has fallen into an error calculated to mislead.

In the first place, according to the practice of all County Courts, and very many of the other local Courts, proceedings cannot be taken for the recovery of any debt unless the plaintiff and defendant reside—as well as the cause of action have arisen—within the jurisdiction of such Courts; so that if this be the practice of the Courts in Yorkshire, "An Attorney" at Preston could not maintain an action in those Courts.

Again; an Attorney may, if he be sued in any inferior Court, plead his privilege of being sued in the superior Court, in which he has been admitted, although the amount of debt be under 40s.

The course of the "Attorney at Preston" is quite clear, if the Solicitor in Yorkshire is responsible. Let him bring an action in the Court of Queen's Bench for the recovery of his charges—the Solicitor in Yorkshire will soon find it too expensive to delay payment. This would also be a very effectual remedy for the recovery of small agency charges from London Solicitors, and, if adopted in a few instances, would probably induce a systematic settlement in future.—I am, Sir, your's, &c.

Hereford, 2nd July, 1846.

SELECTIONS FROM CORRESPONDENCE.

"H." thus writes on the subject of railway liabilities:—

I am tempted, from the importance of the subject at this moment, to write a few lines in answer to E. W. C.'s article on the liability of Provisional Committee-men, in your last week's paper, hoping to provoke further elucidation of the subject, which I do not think E. W. C. has exhausted, nor do I think that he has conclusively argued what he has advanced.

He speaks of two positions, one of a provisional committee only, and the other of a provisional committee, and a self-elected managing committee, apparently two wholly distinct bodies, and the latter admitting of no interference from the former. There is, however, in practice, a third position, that of a provisional committee, and a self-elected managing committee, who have their acts confirmed, or seek to do so, by convening a general meeting of the provisional committee to confirm their acts. But I think in most cases it will be found that the managing committee are not a wholly distinct body from the provisional committee, but that they are a section of the latter committee, and that the members of the managing committee are enumerated in the prospectuses among both committees; but the one great hiatus, however, which I most respectfully submit to exist in E. W. C.'s argument is, that he omits to notice that every member of either committee is, without distinction, designated by 7 & 8 Vic. c. 110, s. 3, a promoter, and every such promoter, is, by the 4th section, compulsorily a shareholder, or rather a subscriber; that Act, therefore, removes every distinction to the extent of making every one who lends his name equally a promoter, and rateably with the number of his shares interested in the success and non-success of the undertaking, in other words, in its profits and loss. With the greatest deference, therefore, I submit that the legislature must have intended some liability to attach to promoter, shareholders, or subscribers; or such as theretofore attached to so called patrons or approvers who simply lent their names as such, and never interfered, or intended to take any interest in the undertaking; and therefore the terms patrons or approvers are not now applicable to provisional committee-men.

We find, then, that every promoter is an interested man in the undertaking, and has a voice in it; and, having a voice in it, it is laches if he don't use it; and if he don't use it, he must be presumed to be content to be led and guided by those who do interfere. And I submit that it is idle to say that the managing committee won't be interfered with by the other members of the provisional committee. They either can't help themselves, or they have the specific authority of such other members for so acting; and either position must in law and justice fix all parties to the general liabilities within the scope of the undertaking. I submit again, that every person deliberately agreeing in writing to be a promoter, shareholder, or subscriber of a railway, assumes an active duty and obligation; and that it is not open to him to be a passive spectator, and so absolve himself from liability. He, in fact, holds himself out to the public either as a managing man, or as one who can, will, and ought to control, so far as one voice goes, the undertaking generally, so as to make it profitable.

ble to those who are invited to, and on the strength of his name so appearing do, subscribe to the undertaking. A man who can, but does not control, under these circumstances, must be as liable as if he did control.

But the more immediate question is one of implied authority to contract debts by lending his name as a member of the provisional committee; and it is contended that, as he did not appoint the managing committee, and they would not permit interference, they cannot be his implied agents. To this, I again submit, no managing committee can be so circumstanced; they may be self-elected, but they gain no powers by such self-constitution, which the remaining members of the committee cannot control or altogether supersede. It seems conceded that the provisional committee, as a body, are joint and several contractors; and that the contracts of the few, if passively or actually allowed by the many, bind all. Now, allow me to ask, is not this precisely the case of the managing committee, which is only a section or few of the general provisional committee? Why, therefore, are the remainder of the provisional committee to be free from liability?

To plead ignorance of what is going on, appears to me quite indefensible. If what I have urged be correct, there is no legal distinction in point of object or interest in any member who is a promoter. We find 100 gentlemen called by themselves, and advertised as provisional committee-men, but in law all "promoter shareholders;" and some twelve of these 100 men also assume the name of managers. They all, without distinction, deliberately combine for the express purpose of creating such liabilities for their mutual profit or loss, as may be necessary, towards attaining the common object—a railway. They all know that certain work must be done, certain expenses must be incurred, and that within a limited time; they have confederated for that express object, nay, they have pledged themselves to the public so to do, and they must give account of their stewardship; can it be contended, with the slightest appearance of reason and justice, that any member (he being, remember, a person interested, by his voluntary agreement, in writing, in the profit and loss of the venture) may say with impunity, I know nothing about how it is managed, or who manages it; I never interfere. He must know it can't proceed without management; that it, in fact, is managed; that he can, if he please, control such management, but that he has omitted to do so, and that therefore he has implicitly given his authority to the managers, whoever they may be.

"An Original Subscriber" thus writes on the subject of the "Mutiny and Annual Indemnity Acts:"—

In going through your paper on Saturday night, an idea crossed my mind which has probably crossed it on each perusal of the Statute Book for the last twenty years or more, and which is this:—Why the provisions of the Mutiny Act, Annual Indemnity Act, and Acts of this description, should appear on the statute rolls every year, or in other words, why some general Acts should not be passed, to which the temporary annual Acts might be made to refer. This principle is being now so extensively adopted, that I am surprised to find it is not adopted with reference to the Acts in question.

Heirs-at-Law, Next of Kin, &c. Wanted.

SATURDAY, JULY 4, 1846.

PRIVILEGE OF THE BAR.

THE case of Butt v. Jackson, which has occupied the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, elicited an elaborate judgment upon the right of Counsel to unlimited abuse, and so warmly interests the Profession on both sides of the channel, that it must not pass without comment. The event itself is extraordinary, and the question it raises a grave one.

It will be seen that the Irish judges have determined, in effect, that the privilege usually understood to belong to Counsel, of saying what they please about any matter or person before the Court, is not really theirs, and has been only not disputed, because they have hitherto exercised that supposed privilege with discretion and forbearance.

We have very considerable doubt whether our own Court of Queen's Bench, with Lord DENMAN ever prompt to maintain to the utmost the rights and privileges of the Profession, would not have asserted the right of Counsel to unlimited speech, while it would have rebuked any abuse of that privilege. But we cannot say that such abuse of it is rare. We have heard, from men whose memories go back to the Bar of a past generation, that the license of speech in those days was vastly greater than it now is; that bullying and browbeating were the common practice of distinguished advocates; and that character was remorselessly assailed by a speaker whenever it was deemed desirable to discredit a witness.

Undoubtedly we have improved mightily in this respect. The bewigged bully is now the disreputable exception, and not the rule, as formerly. When a Barrister puts on his gown he does not put off the gentleman, nor usually does he venture to say at the Bar what he would not repeat in any other position. We say, that such is now the ordinary bearing of Counsel. But still, it must be admitted, do we find a class of men who make a sort of notoriety by blustering, and to whom the censure of the Irish judges would properly apply. To such, and to those who may be tempted by their apparent success to imitate their example, we commend a careful perusal, not of the judicial proceedings only in the case alluded to, but also to the meeting of the Attorneys, reported a short time since, held to express their sympathy with Mr. JACKSON.

Of all kinds of abuse current at the Bar, the most vulgar, and in the worst taste, is that so often indulged in of attacking an attorney. It is the ready resource of a barren mind, which, unable to frame a substantial argument out of the facts, seizes in despair at so easy and popular a method of amusing the ears of the Court. It is an act of cowardice, because the party assailed is not permitted to defend himself. And yet we see it daily practised, and passing unrebuked; and they who adopt it call themselves gentlemen, and, more strange still, it is partly sanctioned by the very persons who are the victims of the practice.

The proceedings of the Attorneys in Ireland offer an example how this evil practice may be suppressed. Let the Attorneys' Clubs everywhere declare their disapprobation, and recommend their professional brethren not to give their briefs to any man at the Bar who may permit that license to his tongue. Such a resolution would be more effective than the censures of the Judges. It would make abuse unprofitable, and when it ceases to pay it will be speedily abandoned.

Indeed, the entire system of browbeating and abuse is not only wrong in principle and an offence against good taste and gentlemanly feeling, but it is, moreover, like all wrong, a great mistake. It does not, in the long run, secure the end for which it is employed. It is always disagreeable to the Court, and deprives the Counsel who resorts to it of that confidence and ready access to its ear which is so necessary to the successful discharge of his duties. To juries it is usually distasteful. They have the feelings of men, and it offends them to hear a witness who could have had no motive for falsehood charged with perjury, or one of blameless life loaded with obloquy, because it serves the purpose of the moment. A jury is so much more easily satisfied that a witness may be mistaken, than that he has wilfully perjured himself, that it is with astonishment we continually hear accusations of crime, when common sense, to say nothing of Christian feeling, would dictate that the error, if any, was only one of memory.

We trust, therefore, that the proceedings in Ireland, by directing attention to the subject of the abuse of the privilege of counsel, will lead to a change in the practice of many who may have erred hitherto from want of consideration. The privilege itself is a great, a glorious, a useful one; but that we may preserve and hand it down in its integrity to our successors, it is necessary, in these days of inquiry and reform, that we should take special care not to abuse it.

SHORT CONVEYANCES.

THIS bill has passed into the Commons, and in its progress through the committee of the Lords, its length has been more than doubled by the addition of short forms applicable to various kinds of conveyances, not included in the original bill, such as mortgage of reversionary interest in stock, mortgage of policy of assurance, transfer of mortgage, reconveyance of mortgaged property, covenants for titles, releases, &c. &c. Whether the recent change in the Government will stay its further progress we know not, but so far it has advanced without a word of opposition or objection from any quarter; and it is not improbable that, thus tacitly approved, it may be permitted to become law; and the lawyers cannot find one man in all the legislature to say for them—"This is a measure of serious moment; of vast extent; give us the practical men, who alone can judge how it will work—time to investigate its provisions, to state objections or improvements, and do not hurry it through Parliament faster even than we can read it, much less examine its bearings upon other parts of the law."

So reasonable a request could not be refused. But we have no friend who could make it for us, and assign a reason for it. So the measure will pass without one of the compensations to which the lawyers are entitled, in the shape of abolished certificate duties, and the placing of the Conveyancing under the same protection as the Common Law and Equity branches of their profession.

The 14th number of Cox's Criminal Law Cases was published on Monday, and the 15th and 16th will be ready next week, so as to complete the fourth part for the ensuing assizes.

LAW TIMES EDITION OF IMPORTANT STATUTES.

THE fourth edition of the Registration of Electors Acts, incorporating the Reform Bill and other statutes, and with notes of the cases decided on appeal to the Court of Common Pleas, is now ready.

RAILWAY LITIGATION.

SINCE the last commentary, some cases have been decided, and some objections have been raised by correspondents of the LAW TIMES, alike requiring notice, and as the interest and importance of the subject have not diminished, no apology is needed for returning to it.

And first, as to the suggestion for avoiding a multiplicity of actions for the same debt. It has been shrewdly observed, that inasmuch as the judgment only, and not the verdict can be pleaded, the defence would not avail in causes set down for trial at the same sittings or assizes. This is true: but we have no doubt that in such case the Court would, on application, postpone the other trials, so as to permit of the defence being put in, and to avoid the practical absurdity of twenty distinct judgments for the same cause of action.

At all events, the difficulty might be avoided by one of the defendants permitting judgment to go against him by default, the rest pleading.

In illustration of the remark upon which we mentioned some time since that we believed the judges would punish any attempts made by an attorney to increase costs by issuing many writs for the same debt, we are glad to adduce an expression which fell from Chief Baron POLLOCK, to the effect that, if such a case were brought under the notice of the Court, means would be found to punish the offender.

Another correspondent, whose communication appears in the LAW TIMES of this day, enters at great length upon the question of the relative liabilities of managing and provisional committees, contending, with much ability, that there is no distinction in fact between the two parties, and therefore that there should be none in law. But having given to his argument the consideration it deserves, we must adhere to our former views, and not the less since they have received the confirmation of Chief Baron POLLOCK, in the case of Banks v. Goode, 7 Law T. 286. In the course of his summing up in that case, he remarked, "The case of Lov v. Wilson, which had been mentioned as decided by his learned brother PARKE, was different from this, inasmuch as in that case there had been a managing, as well as a provisional committee; whilst here, the former had not had any existence. As he had perused the report in the ordinary channel of public information, his opinion had gone along with that expressed from the Bench by his learned brother."

With the expressed opinions of two judges upon the point, it is unnecessary here to enter into the controversy. If the distinction exists in law, there can be no question that it does so in fact. How many of the hundreds of respectable persons who permitted their names to be placed upon provisional committees, did so with any other intention than that of patronage—as expressing their approval of the project, and their willingness to support it by taking shares? How many of them imagined that thereby they were giving an implied authority to the managing committee to pledge their credit for any amount they pleased? The test of the intent is this. If it had been stated to the party that the purpose of the application was that he should suffer a managing committee, in whose proceedings he was allowed to take no part, to incur as many debts as they pleased, without asking his opinion or consent, and for which debts he was to be liable, would the party have consented to join the provisional committee? If he would not have done so, knowing the liabilities, it shows that by doing so he did not intend to share those liabilities; and if he did not put down his name with that intent, according to the ruling in the case of Parrett v. Blunt and Another, 7 Law T. 286, he would not be liable.

And justice points in the same direction as the law. The managing committee incurred the debt; their folly it was to rush into expenses before the means for payment were secured; if any advantages had accrued from success, they would have been theirs alone. It is, therefore, a manifest injustice to shift the burden upon parties innocent of incurring the debts, who were to profit nothing by success, and who are only called upon when the real wrong-doers want assistance to help them out of a difficulty of their own creation.

The next important point has been that decided in Wontner v. Shairp, 7 Law T. 287, in which it was held, that where there had been misrepresentation by a Managing Committee, an allottee may recover back the deposits paid, even although he had executed the subscribers' agreement and parliamentary contract, those deeds having been so executed in consequence of such misrepresentation, and being therefore void as tainted with fraud.

The principle here established is clear and indisputable; but some care will be required in its application. The misrepresentation must be within the knowledge of the defendant, and therefore it would be unsafe to bring such an action against any but a member of the Managing Committee; a Provisional Committee-man, who had never acted in the matter, would not be liable in this action, as he is in case of debts due to third parties, and to which his credit has been impliedly pledged. Fraud cannot be implied, it must be distinctly proved. Where there was a Managing Committee, actions to recover back deposits can only be brought with safety against the entire body, or one of its members.

Another question of great importance to the Profession was raised in the case of Parrett v. Blunt and Another, 7 Law T. 287. Here the solicitor to the company had ordered the insertion of advertisements without any authority from the Committee. Are the members of the Committee liable for his order? The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, but leave was reserved to the defendants to enter a nonsuit on this ground, so that the question will ultimately come before the Court above. But it may be observed, that to order advertisements is no part of the duty of a solicitor, and, therefore, not within the scope of his implied authority. If he could order advertisements, he could order a survey, or any thing else that he chooses to consider desirable, without consulting his clients. The proposition is so monstrous when thus broadly stated, that there can be little doubt as to the result. Therefore care should be taken to ascertain by whom and by what authority the debt was incurred, before an action is brought. Nor is there any real hardship in this upon creditors. Before a man allows extensive credit, he is bound to see that the party giving an order on behalf of others is duly authorized; if he omit this obvious duty, it is at his own peril, and he may fairly be deemed to have given credit to the party from whom he received the order.

Such are the points that have presented themselves since last the subject was brought under the notice of the reader. They will require to be weighed well by all engaged in the railway litigation before any step be taken on either side; and it is with this view that they are collected and commented upon here.

New Books.

A New Law Dictionary, containing Explanations of such Technical Terms and Phrases as occur in the works of Legal Authors, in the Practice of the Courts, and in the Parliamentary Proceedings of the Houses of Lords and Commons; to which is added an outline of an Action-at-Law and of a Suit in Equity. By HENRY JAMES HOLTHOUSE, Esq. of the Inner-Temple, Special Pleader. Second edition, enlarged, crown 8vo. London, 1846. Thomas Blenkarn.

THIS is a great improvement upon the old Law Dictionaries. It is not a collection of treatises, like some, nor a mere naked definition of technical terms, like others; but it strikes the happy medium between meagreness and prolixity, and gives to the practitioner and the student just the sort of information he would look for in a dictionary, and that which is equally valuable, instruction where further particulars are to be found. In this second edition Mr. HOLTHOUSE has introduced many new headings which have risen into importance since the appearance of the first, and he has corrected some errors unavoidable in the carrying out of so extensive a design, and enlarged some articles that were deemed too curt for their purpose. Altogether, in its composition, its convenient size, and neat typography, this volume will be an acquisition to all engaged in the study, the practice, or the administration of the law, to be ever at hand as a faithful interpreter of other books.

The Law Digest; a general Index to the Reports published between the 1st of July and 31st of December, 1845. London, 1846. Law Times Office.

THIS laborious undertaking is intended to supply the practitioner with a ready reference to all the law decided during the half-year ending on the 1st of January, and it is, if successful, to be continued half-yearly. The plan is simple and convenient. All the cases reported during the half-year are arranged under their proper subjects, and these are placed alphabetically. If, therefore, the practitioner wants to ascertain what cases have been decided, say on the law of "Executors," he turns to that title, and under it he will find every case, where-soever reported, briefly digested with reference to the report, or reports, if more than one, where it appears. Besides this, there is an index to the names of cases, and to the names both of defendants and plaintiffs, so that if one be forgotten the case may still be traced by means of the other. The peculiarity of this work, and that in which it differs from any other digest, is, that it includes all the reports, whereas all the other digests exclude some, being guided in their selection, not by the wants of the practitioner, but according to the rivalries of publishers. The plan of this Digest is to omit none, and its consequent completeness gives it a peculiar value and utility. The amount of exclusion from the other digests may be judged by this, that the Digest before us, although embracing the reports only for half-a-year, contains more cases than does either of the others for a whole year, and the mere index of the names of the cases digested occupies no less than twenty-four closely printed columns. There is also a table of the statutes cited, arranged in chronological order.

It will not become us to express an opinion upon the merits of this publication. We can only give a description of it, leaving it to the reader from that description to determine whether it is likely to be an acquisition to his office.

A PRACTICAL COMMENTARY

ON

By WILLIAM HUGHES, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

DUTIES OF PURCHASER'S SOLICITOR IN INVESTIGATING THE TITLE.

1. Preliminary remarks.
2. Practical suggestions on the perusal of an abstract.
3. Legal operation and effect of the various instruments.
4. Execution and attestation of documents.
5. Descents.
6. As to estates pur autre vie.
7. Estates for years.
8. Copyhold and customary estates.

1. Preliminary Remarks.

The principal duty of the purchaser's solicitor is to ascertain whether the vendor can confer a good title, and if so, then to take care that the property is properly conveyed to his client. In investigating a title, the usual course is for the purchaser's solicitor to ascertain whether a good and marketable title appears on the face of the abstract; and if satisfied in this respect, to compare it with the documents therein set forth, in order to discover how far they correspond; and being satisfied also upon this most essential point, to see that the documents themselves are legally executed by the proper parties, and duly attested. Where there is pecuniary consideration, he should also see that the receipt is duly indorsed and signed. If enrolment was essential, he should see that this has been done accordingly; and, what is frequently never thought of, or, at any rate, very frequently overlooked, he should ascertain that the deeds bear the proper stamps.

Abstract should be submitted to counsel, When.—If the title is in the least degree complicated, the abstract should always be submitted to counsel for perusal. Strictly speaking, indeed, it is the duty of a purchaser's solicitor to submit the abstract to counsel in every instance, and by omitting to do so he renders himself personally responsible for any loss or prejudice his client may sustain in consequence of his accepting a bad, incumbered, or unmarketable title. (Thwaites v. Mackerson, 3 Carr. & Pay. 341; Wilson v. Tucker, 3 Stark. 104.) But this personal liability may often prove an inadequate recompense for the consequences of an act of negligence of this kind. Many solicitors, however willing, may be wholly unable to compensate a client who, on account of having bought property with a defective title, is either evicted from it outright, or compelled to hold it saddled with heavy incumbrances; added to which, all remedy against a solicitor for a default of this kind will be barred by the Statute of Limitations (stat. 21 Jac. 1, c. 16), six years after the commission of the act or default, without any reference to the time the actual damage accrued (Short v. McCarthy, 3 B. & A. 626; Howell v. Young, 5 B. & C. 259; 2 Carr. & Pay. 238); consequently, if such damage did not accrue within the six years, the remedy against the solicitors would be altogether barred. And even where compensation could be obtained, from what I have seen in matters of a like kind, I do not believe that one wronged client out of ten would attempt to enforce it. As a moral point of duty, therefore, if the slightest doubt arises upon the validity of a title, no solicitor should rely simply upon his own opinion, or take upon himself the responsibility of accepting it without having had the title investigated by counsel.

2. Practical Suggestions on the Perusal of an Abstract.

The principal objects to be kept in view in perusing an abstract, are,—1. To see that the title is carried back sufficiently far. 2. To discover the legal operation and effect of the various instruments, and the capacity of the various parties. 3. That there is a clear deduction both of the legal and equitable estate; to arrive at which it must be ascertained that all particular estates are either determined or can be conveyed to the purchaser, and that there are no incumbrances, or if there are, that they are of such a nature as can be got rid of, so that a clear and unburdened estate may pass to the purchaser. 4. It must appear beyond all doubt that the parcels comprised in any deed then under investigation are the same that are comprised in the former deeds (3 Prest. Abs. 33); and if the identity does not sufficiently appear from the abstract, it must be authenticated by extraneous evidence. This can usually be effected through the medium of land-tax or poor-rate assessments, when, if it should appear that such assessments have been made without any variation, except in the change of the owner's name, it may reasonably be presumed that all is right. (Id. id.)

Distinction between questions of conveyance and questions of title.—Another object which must never be lost sight of during the course of investigation, is the distinction between questions merely of conveyance and questions of title; that is to say, if the estate is outstanding in a trustee or any one who is under a legal obligation to make such a conveyance as the vendor shall direct, then it is a question of conveyance merely; but if the estate be outstanding in a party who is under no legal or moral obligation to convey it, it is a question of title. (Elliott v. Merryman, Barnardist, 82; Wynn v. Williams, 5 Ves. 130; Page v. Adam, 9 L. J. 407.) In the latter instance the title is bad; in the former it is good; for the vendor being able to obtain the concurrence of all necessary parties, is thus enabled to convey an absolute estate to the purchaser.

How to analyze an abstract.—It will generally be advisable for the peruser to make an analysis of the abstract, which will be found to accelerate as well as simplify the labour of investigation. This course will be particularly advantageous where different parcels of land are derived through various channels, and the several documents relating to each are blended together in the abstract, according to their respective dates, when considerable confusion may arise, unless each portion is, as it ought to be, arranged under a distinct head, and treated altogether as if it was a distinct title, until the various portions unite in one person; and the like observations are also applicable to cases where there have been several mortgages of the same lands to different mortgagees, when the title of each mortgagee, as also the title of the equity of redemption, should be distinctly considered; an investigation which will be greatly accelerated by making a short analysis, an excellent form of which is furnished by Mr. Preston, in the appendix to his valuable work on abstracts of title.

In an ordinary case, an abstract of an estate of inheritance may be analyzed in the following simple manner:—1796, 3rd and 4th of June. Indre. of le. and rele.—Rele. A B conveyed to C D in fee; 1800, Oct. 7, C D devises to E F in fee; 1801, Nov. 10, testator died; 1802, Jan. 17, will proved in Prerogative Court of Canterbury; 1803, 1st and 2nd of March, E F conveys to J H in fee to uses to bar dower; 1805, 12th of May, J H mortgages to J L by appointment; and thus continue to set out the various instruments according to their respective dates and orders.

What inquiries should be made when important documents are omitted.—After making an analysis of the abstract, the attention should be particularly directed to see whether every document necessary to the elucidation of the title is there set forth; and if it should appear that any are omitted, or merely mentioned in the recitals, or simply referred to, they should be called for and their production insisted upon. This frequently occurs where persons seized in fee have made wills, but have made no disposition of the abstracted property; when the will ought to be produced, as affording the best and most conclusive and satisfactory evidence of that fact. The common practice of conveyancers, however, is to rest satisfied with the production of the probate copy, and not to require the original will. (Cov. Ev. 1.) Inquiry should also be made as to whether any owners of the property executed a marriage settlement, and, if so, its production should be required, in order to ascertain that the property is not affected by it; nothing should be taken for granted where proper evidence of the fact can be produced. Hence the peruser of an abstract should never rest satisfied with the bare statement of the fact of "fine levied," or, "recovery suffered accordingly;" but should call for the production of the chirograph of the fine, or exemplification of the recovery. Every stated fact should be supported by the proper evidence. To prove intestacy, therefore, letters of administration to the effects of the intestate should be produced; to prove the appointment of executors, an office extract from the will by which they were so appointed; to prove a pedigree, certificates of births, baptisms, marriages, deaths, and burials; and to prove the payment of an annuity or other annual charge, the last receipt from the party entitled acknowledging the payment.

Office copies from awards under Inclosure Acts, and an attested and examined copy of an Act of Parliament, not made a public one, or a printed copy of it made evidence, should be called for when such documents in any way relate to the abstracted premises.

Where any important fact is not mentioned, an inquiry becomes requisite.—Where any important fact is not stated in the abstract, as, for example, the enrolment of a deed of bargain and sale, or disentailing deed; livery of seisin in the case of a feoffment; the acknowledgment of a married woman; the registration of a deed in a register county; or that the terms of a power, as where a deed is required to be attested by two witnesses, have been duly complied with, it should be asked whether these things have been done.

Where any unaccountable act has been done, inquiry becomes necessary.—Another subject demanding a strict inquiry, is when any unaccountable circumstance appears on the abstract; as where any act is done without any apparent reason, which is a matter always sufficient to excite suspicion; as, for instance, where a feoffment is made, or a fine levied, or a recovery suffered, and there does not appear to be any ostensible cause for those assurances having been made and entered into. So, where any unusual occurrence takes place, as when a deed is delivered as an escrow, it should be fully ascertained that every condition has been performed, and that the second delivery has taken place.

Requisitions, how usually inserted.—Requisitions like those I have just alluded to are generally inserted in the margin, where they readily attract the attention; the more important points being set out at the end of the abstract. Before, however, any marginal remarks are made, the abstract should be gone through and analysed, otherwise the margins may, as I have often seen them, be incumbered with a host of requisitions, which, on a further perusal, it will be seen have been already complied with.

Legal operation and effect of the various instruments.—The construction of the various documents necessary to establish a title is one of the most difficult, yet important, portions of a conveyancer's duties. Sometimes one part of an instrument is repugnant to another, when it becomes a question which is to prevail, and this, in great measure, will depend on the kind of instrument in which such repugnancy is found; if it be in a deed, then the general rule is, that the former clause shall prevail; if in a will, that the latter clause shall control the former one; though both in deeds and wills, as will be shewn hereafter, these rules are not without some exceptions. The same words also, when inserted in a deed, may receive a different interpretation when found in a will; and even when found in an instrument of the same kind, it may operate differently in relation to the time at which such instrument was made; as a will made prior or subsequent to the late Will Act (stat. 1 Vict. c. 26); or even when contained in the selfsame instrument, when the identical terms are applied to property of a distinct kind, or to devisees who stand in a peculiar degree of relationship to each other. The same terms may also convey a different interest when they relate to an equitable than they would if applied to a legal estate.

Where one part of an instrument is repugnant to another.—As a general rule in the case of a deed where the clauses have been repugnant to each other, the former clause has been allowed to prevail, though its effect would be to annihilate the latter one altogether; as if a grant were to be made to A and his heirs in the premises, and by the habendum the limitation was to be restrained to his life, the habendum would be rejected as repugnant to the estate of inheritance conferred on him by the premises, which a subsequent clause would not be permitted to divest. (21 Hen. 6, c. 7; 2 Rep. 23; 8 Rep. 56; Prest. Shep. Touch. 102.) But the habendum may explain what particular kind of heirs were intended, without being considered repugnant to the grant; therefore a limitation to A and his heirs; habendum to A and the heirs of his body, would not be considered as inconsistent; but the habendum, explaining the particular kind of heirs, cuts down what would otherwise have been an estate in fee-simple into an estate tail. (8 Co. 154, b.) And, notwithstanding the general rule of law is, that where there is any repugnancy between the premises and the habendum, the former shall operate and the latter be rejected, there are still certain circumstances under which the habendum will be allowed to supersede the former, as where the property is so limited that the grant is made to a person incapable of taking under it, as occurred in Spyve v. Topham (3 East, 155). In that case the lease for a year was made to Bass, and the re-lease, which was between one Thickerton, of the first part, Topham, of the second part, and Bass, as a trustee for Topham, of the third part, and in consideration of 700*l.* paid by Topham, it was witnessed that Thickerton confirmed to Topham and his heirs, to hold to Bass and his heirs to uses, which gave Topham a power of appointment. Now as the lease for a year was made to Bass, Topham had no estate which was capable of an enlargement; and it was, therefore, urged, that as Bass was named in the habendum only, and not in the granting clause of the lease, he would not be deemed the re-leasee. The Court, however, rejected the grant or re-lease to Topham, and treated Bass, though named in the habendum and omitted in the premises, as the re-leasee; the judges at the same time observing, that the cases cited (a) were perfectly satisfactory in authorizing them to put a construction upon the deed in support of it, which, from the reason and sense of the thing, they should probably have done without such authorities. But, generally speaking, where one person is named as a grantee in the premises, and the other in the habendum, the grantee named in the premises would take to the exclusion of the grantee in the habendum; unless, indeed, the assurance were effected by a feoffment; for then it seems whichever grantee received the livery of seisin would have the preference, without respect to the order in which their names were respectively mentioned in the charter; livery of seisin being, in fact, the essential part of a feoffment. (1 Pres. Abs. 98, 99.)

As to terms of years.—It seems also to have been formerly considered that a limitation of all the estate of a term of years in the premises could not be controlled by the habendum to give a partial interest by way of underlease; but the law is otherwise now; for the rule at present seems to be, that the effect of the grant and habendum collectively taken are to demise the land and all the estate for a term of years; so that there is no repugnancy or inconsistency. (Earl of Derby v. Taylor, 1 East, 502.) Yet it seems that if the assignment contain a grant of all the estate, &c. and by the habendum the term is limited to commence from a future day, as the premises will pass all the time of the term, it will be repugnant to the habendum; for no assignment can be good unless it creates an immediate tenancy, or, in other words, privity, between the assignee and the reversioner. (Jermyn v. Orchard, Show. P. C. 109.) In such case, therefore, the habendum will be deemed repugnant, and, falling within the direct principles of the general rule above laid down, be rejected accordingly. But unless all the estate be limited in the premises, a grant of the lands held for a term to commence from a future day, or upon the happening of an event, is good; as, for example, suppose a lessee grant to A, that if J S shall die, A shall have his term, this is a good grant, and the term is to pass on a contingency; and the grant is suspended in operation, in respect of vesting of the estate, until the contingency happens. (Prest. Shep. Touch. 79; Plow. 524; 7 Taunt. 267.)

As to wills.—The general rule in wills, as I have already mentioned, is, that where two parts are repugnant to each other, so that they cannot possibly both take effect, the latter clause shall prevail. (Co. Litt. 112, b; Ulrich v. Litchfield, 2 Atk. 372; Sims v. Doughty, 5 Ves. 243; Constantine v. Constantine, 6 Ves. 100; Doe dem. Leicester v. Biggs, 1 Taunt. 109.) The case of Crowe v. Odell (1 Ball & Beat. 449, and 3 Dow. 61) affords a good exemplification of this doctrine. There, a testator devised the residue of his real and personal property to his children, A, B, and C, and their younger children, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, for ever, which made it a clear joint devise; but he afterwards went on to declare that, nevertheless, his intentions were that A should receive the entire interest, or yearly produce, of such part of his real or personal fortune as he (the testator) intended for his younger children, during his life. The testator then made a similar direction as to B and C; and he provided that, in case any of his said children should die, the share of such should go to the younger children of such children; if no younger children, to the survivors. And he gave the parents a power of distribution among their younger children. Lord Clare, when Chancellor of Ireland, had held the parents and children to be entitled jointly; but Lord Manners afterwards determined that the parents took life estates only, with a power of distribution among their children; which decree was affirmed in the House of Lords.

 This Society transacts all the usual business of Life Assurance.
 It is based upon a principle which will combine the benefits of Mutual Assurance with the guarantee of a Subscribed Capital of ONE MILLION STERLING.

Whilst perfect security is thus given, the number and character of the Shareholders (consisting of nearly 500 Members of the Legal Profession), will command a large amount of business, and consequent advantages will arise to the Assured.

Tables of Premiums have been prepared expressly for this Office, by F. G. F. NATION, Esq. F.L.S., calculated on the nearest approximation to the real law of mortality.

These Tables will be found to afford peculiar encouragement to the assurance of young lives. They embrace participating and non-participating scales.

In the participating class, the Assured will be entitled to have four-fifths of the profits divided amongst them periodically, either by way of addition to the amount assured, or in diminution of premium, as the parties may elect. No deduction will be made from such profits for interest of capital, or for a guarantee fund.

The Premiums may be paid half-yearly or annually, or by a single payment.

Assurances may be effected through any respectable Solicitor, or by writing to the Secretary.

The Directors meet on Thursdays at Two o'clock; but Assurances may be effected on any day, by applying between the hours of Ten and Four, at the Office of the Society, where Prospectuses and all other requisite information may be obtained.

57, Chancery-lane.

THE REPORTS.

Equity Courts.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

Tuesday, July 7.

This morning Lord Cottonham took his seat as Chancellor, and, after having taken the usual oaths, proceeded to hear appeal motions.

TARTE V. PHILLIPS.

Practice—Retransfer of causes—Interlocutory motion.

Torriano asked that this cause, which had been transferred from the paper of causes of the Vice-Chancellor of England to that of Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, might be retransferred to the paper of the Vice-Chancellor of England. The principal defendants were consenting parties, and notice of the application had been served upon the others, who did not appear. There had been a motion in the cause for an injunction, heard before the Vice-Chancellor of England, upon which the injunction was granted.

Ordered.

GURNEY V. SEPPINGS.

Mortgagee and mortgagor—Transfer of mortgage debt as a security—Action by mortgagee against mortgagor—Injunction.

Where a mortgagee had assigned the mortgage debt as security for a debt due from him to third parties, and afterwards brought an action against the mortgagee upon the covenant to pay the mortgage money, it was held, reversing the decision below, that the third parties, to whom the mortgage debt was assigned as security, had no equity to stay the action by injunction, except upon the terms of taking the mortgage security in full satisfaction for their debt, and releasing the original mortgagee from his liability to make good the deficiency of the sum due from him beyond the amount of the mortgage debt.

The plaintiffs in this suit were Messrs. Gurney, of Norwich, bankers, and the bill was filed to restrain the defendant from prosecuting an action at law he had commenced against one Nokes under these circumstances. Nokes had made two separate mortgages of 5,000l. each upon two different properties, to the defendant Seppings, and had covenanted to pay both sums in June 1845. In January 1845, Seppings applied to Messrs. Gurney for an advance of 10,000l. which was secured by an assignment to them of the two mortgages for 5,000l. made by Nokes. The sum borrowed by Seppings of Messrs. Gurney was further secured upon other property of his own. In June 1845, when Nokes's mortgages became payable, Seppings called upon Nokes to pay the amount of both mortgages to Messrs. Gurney, and on his failing to do so, immediately commenced an action in the Common Pleas against Nokes, for the recovery of the two sums of 5,000l. In November 1845, the present bill was filed by Messrs. Gurney against Seppings, to restrain him from prosecuting his action against Nokes, alleging that the mortgage debts had been transferred to them, and that they were not desirous of enforcing payment from Nokes personally at present; that the defendant Seppings had no beneficial interest in the mortgage debts; that he was in embarrassed circumstances, and that if the money was paid into his hands, it would be in peril. The bill prayed an injunction to restrain the defendant from prosecuting the action against Nokes, and from receiving the mortgage debts. The Vice-Chancellor had granted an ex parte injunction, and subsequently refused a motion by the defendant to dissolve it. From that order the defendant appealed.

Jas. Parker and Smyth appeared to support the appeal motion to dissolve the injunction. They contended that the suit was, in fact, Nokes' suit, and stated that Seppings's answer displaced the allegations of the bill as to his being in embarrassed circumstances; that the plaintiffs had delayed from June, when they were first aware of the defendant's action, until the following November before they applied for an injunction. The defendant had offered to put himself in the plaintiffs' hands, and to have his action conducted by them, provided they would only prosecute it with diligence. The security of the mortgages was expected to be deficient, and it most was important to the defendant to get as much as possible from Nokes, the mortgagor. The defendant's position was that of a surety, and he had a right to enforce all his remedies.

Walker and Rogers, for the plaintiffs, contended that, if the action proceeded, the security would be deteriorated, Nokes being already in gaol. The plaintiffs' debt is of the same amount as the mortgages which had been assigned to them by the defendant, who, by that assignment, had been converted into a trustee for the plaintiffs. That the defendant's statement in his answer, that he is engaged in affairs of a speculative nature, substantially admits that he is embarrassed; and that it is no answer to the plaintiffs' demand to stay the action, that he means to pay over the money as soon as he has recovered it from Nokes. The defendant has no right to receive the money, it is the plaintiffs' money.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (without hearing a reply).—This is a very clear case. The question is, whether the plaintiffs, as assignees of the mortgage debts, have such an interest in the money as will entitle them to restrain the defendant from suing his mortgagor upon the covenants contained in the mortgaged deeds. The plaintiffs are assignees of two debts and mortgages, and have the first interest in the money to be paid by Nokes. On the other hand, the defendant Seppings says, he is under a personal responsibility to the Messrs. Gurneys for the payment of the debt, and that having an interest in the money he has a right to recover it. The defendant stands in the situation of surety for the amount of 10,000l. to Messrs. Gurney, and is bound to make good to them any difference there may be between the sum due and the amount realized upon the mortgage securities. He does not stand in the situation of a naked trustee; as surety, he has an interest in the amount to be obtained from Nokes, the mortgagor; and, being liable for the whole 10,000l. to the plaintiffs, he has a right to endeavour to realize what he can from the mortgagor. The plaintiffs cannot restrain the defendant from enforcing his securities, and still hold him liable. If they chose him, they may take to the securities in satisfaction of their debt.

The plaintiffs may take an injunction, upon the terms that they release the defendant from all claims upon him beyond what may be produced by the mortgage securities. It seems to have been the impression of the Vice-Chancellor that such would be the effect of his order; but that is a question of great nicety, and it is not necessary to leave the parties to realize that equity. The defendant may undertake to pay into court, or to pay to Messrs. Gurney, the amount which may be recovered from Nokes.

Jas. Parker.—The defendant does not want to receive the money, he is only desirous that the action should be prosecuted bona fide.

Walker.—Let the defendant consent that the sheriff may pay over the sum which may be obtained to Messrs. Gurney.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The parties may arrange that between themselves upon the principles I have stated. The injunction must be dissolved.

BLENKINSOP V. BLENKINSOP.

Practice—Service of subpoena on the defendant out of the jurisdiction—33rd Order of May 1845.

Wakefield and Faber moved, by way of appeal, to discharge an order made by the Master of the Rolls, which directed that the plaintiff might be at liberty to serve one of the defendants, who was resident out of the jurisdiction. The order was made under the 1st rule of the 33rd Order of May 1845, which provides that "the Court, upon application, supported by such evidence as shall satisfy the Court in what place or country such defendant is or may probably be found, may order that the subpoena to appear to, or to appear to and answer the bill, may be served on such defendant in such place or country, or within such limits as the Court thinks fit to direct." For a long period it was held to be a doubtful point in this court whether service of the subpoena on a defendant out of the jurisdiction was good; but it was ultimately settled that such service was not good. Then, by Act of 2 Wm. 4, c. 33, it was enacted, that service of subpoena upon a defendant resident in Scotland or Ireland in any suits respecting land, made in pursuance of an order, should be deemed good service, upon the terms and at the time the Court should direct. But under that Act the plaintiff could not, after such service, enter an appearance for the absent defendant. Then by the 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 82, power was given to the Court to order a defendant, resident in any part of the world out of the jurisdiction, not in Scotland or Ireland, to be served with a subpoena. Then the general Order of May, 1845, gave power to the Court to serve such an order in all suits. The affidavit upon which the present order had been obtained merely stated that the defendant was then, and had for a certain long time past, been residing within the sanctuary of Holyrood House, in Scotland, but it did not state that he had gone out of the jurisdiction, or, in fact, that he had ever been within it. If such an enlarged construction were adopted, there was nothing to prevent a suit in this court between two foreigners resident out of the jurisdiction, with respect to subject-matter which had never been within the jurisdiction of the Court. Such would be the effect of the decision made by Vice-Chancellor Wigram upon this order in the case of Whitmore v. Ryan (15 Law J. 232). But that could not be sustained; the true principle was laid down by Lord Ellenborough in Buchanan v. Beard (9 East, 191), where he held that an act which authorized certain proceedings to be taken against a person "absent from the island" could not apply to a person who had never been present and subject to the jurisdiction. If neither the person nor the subject-matter of the suit was necessarily present, the procedure of the Court may be carried in vain.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—This order was made, I presume, upon the special circumstances of the case. When the Court orders substituted service of the subpoena, it always does so upon a consideration of the special circumstances of the case. Here I find the affidavit is referred to in the order.

Glesse and Boyle contended, that it was plain, from the pleadings and the nature of the suit, that the subject-matter was in this country, and the Court had regard to those circumstances. They cited Whitmore v. Ryan (supra), Jones v. Geddes (15 Law J.), Wakefield, in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR dismissed the application with costs.

GILBERT V. COOPER.

Short notice of motion—Injunction—Railway company. Torrell asked leave to give short notice of motion of appeal from the order of the Vice-Chancellor, which restrained the defendants (a railway company) from disposing of 55,000l. and produced very great inconvenience.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I will hear the motion on Saturday.

VICE-CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND'S COURT.

Thursday, March 26.

ADAMS V. HEATHCOTE.

Vendor and purchaser—Minority of vendor—Act of ownership by purchase—Objection to title—Laches. A purchaser under an agreement entered into possession and into receipt of the rents and profits of certain messuages and premises in the year 1827, without prejudice as to any question of title. After the delivery of the abstract, the purchaser took objections to the title, and by reason of a party necessary to the conveyance being a minor, the conveyance was postponed. The purchaser remained in possession down to the time of filing the bill, performing certain acts of ownership, and still offering objections to the title. Upon motion of the vendor in a suit for specific performance, Held, that the defendant ought to pay the purchase-money into court with interest, after the usual rate of 4l. per cent.

The bill stated that the plaintiffs, B—, Adams, and certain other persons, being entitled to certain messuages and premises, entered into an agreement with the defendant for the sale to him of the same. The agreement bore date the 19th of December, 1825, and was signed by the parties, part of which agreement was as follows:—"The purchase-money to be paid on the 25th of March, 1827, on a good title being made to the same, from which time the said R. E. Heathcote is to enter into the receipt of the rents and profits of the same; but if from any cause the purchase-money shall not be paid on the said 25th of March, 1827, then the same to bear interest after the rate of 4l. for every 100l. by the year until the same shall be paid; the said parties hereto of the first part to make out a good title to the premises, and to deliver an abstract of such title at their own expense to the said R. E. Heathcote, or his solicitor, on or before the 25th of March next." The bill further shewed that the defendant entered into the receipt of the rents and profits of the said premises on the 25th of March, 1827; that an abstract of title had been furnished to the solicitor of the defendant, who made certain requisitions on behalf of the defendant, and that it then appeared that one of the parties, who was necessary to join in the conveyance, was then an infant, and that the defendant refused to complete his purchase until such infant attained his majority; and that, in consequence thereof, the execution of the conveyance was postponed; that the defendant continued in the possession of the said premises down to the present time, and in all respects dealt with the same as the owner thereof, viz. pulling down parts of the buildings, and committing other acts of waste; that he paid various sums, by way of interest, on the purchase-money, but that, for some time past, he had refused to pay any other sum in respect thereof; that the said infant attained his age of twenty-one years prior to the year 1843, and in that year plaintiff's solicitor furnished an additional abstract to defendant's solicitor, which contained certain other documents, in which it appeared that some of the vendors had, since the said agreement, charged their rights in the said premises, subject to the above agreement; that the defendant's solicitor returned the said abstract, accompanied with various requisitions and observations upon the title; that the plaintiffs' solicitor sent answers to such requisitions, accompanied with a protest that the answers were without prejudice to the right of the plaintiffs to insist that the defendant had accepted the title, and the defendant still refused to perform the agreement. The bill prayed for a specific performance of the contract.

The defendant put in his answer, whereby, admitting the agreement and his entry into possession of the premises about the time mentioned in the bill, insisted that he did so upon the understanding that it was to be without prejudice to any question of title which might arise, and submitted that he ought to be considered more in the light of a receiver than of a purchaser. He denied cutting down timber, but admitted his having pulled down some portion of the buildings, on account of their very dilapidated condition, and for certain other reasons in the defendant's answer mentioned. He denied that a good title had been shewn by the vendor, and for that reason he refused to complete his contract or pay his purchase-money.

A motion was now made on behalf of the plaintiffs, the chief purposes of which were that the defendant might within one calendar month pay the purchase-money into court, with so much interest thereon, at the rate of 4l. per cent. per annum, from the 25th day of March, 1827, until such payment, after deducting the sum of 690l. 9s. the aggregate amount of the sums in the defendant's answer stated to have been paid for interest, as should be ordered to be paid to the plaintiffs as thereafter mentioned, the amount thereof to be verified by affidavit; or otherwise that a receiver may be appointed of the rents of the said estate, with the usual directions; or otherwise, that possession of the said estate might be delivered up to the plaintiffs by the said defendant.

Bethell and S. Hall, in support of the motion.

Cases cited: Gibson v. Clarke, 1 V. & B. 500; Cutler v. Simons, 2 Mer. 103.

Stuart and Goodave, contra, contended that the present bill was filed for the specific performance of an imperfect contract, and, according to the practice of the Court, the purchaser had still his right to give up possession, and therefore, until all question as to the title was at an end, he ought not to be compelled to pay his purchase-money into court. (Sug. Ven. & Par. 357, 10th edit.)

Bethell, in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—A most unusual period intervened between the agreement in question and the time fixed for its completion. This agreement was dated the 19th of December, 1825, and its performance was appointed to be the 25th of March, 1827. It appears, however, that in the month of March 1827, the defendant thought proper to take possession of the premises upon the understanding, as stated by the answer, that it was to be without prejudice to any question of title. Early in the year 1827, an abstract of title was delivered, which was then but a small abstract. This, however, became ultimately increased in size by the addition of posterior deeds, which the interval consequent upon the minority of a party rendered necessary. The purchaser retained possession of the first abstract until 1837, and then at the vendors' request it was returned to them in order that it might be added to. During this period the purchaser remained in possession, in pursuance of the original agreement, and various acts were done. [His Honor here referred to the defendant's answer, wherein acts of ownership were admitted, and to the correspondence and negotiation which took place between the solicitors of the respective parties relating to the title.] Now I must, in the first place, observe, that the defendant has gone on treating himself more and more in the character of purchaser; for instead of putting an end to the affair by reason of the abstract not shewing a good title, he proceeds in the affair, and a discussion is kept up; then the bill is filed, and an answer is put in. Now, I cannot say that I am satisfied with that part of the defendant's proceeding wherein he endeavours to impress the transaction with a new character, namely, that his possession was to be considered the possession of a receiver merely; for he must have been aware that he entered into possession in the character of a person to a certain extent, at any rate, bound to perform the agreement; indeed, he is fixed by the circumstance stated in his own answer, namely, that he entered into possession "without prejudice to any question of title which might arise." What can be the meaning of this expression, otherwise than his having entered in the character of a purchaser? Such a statement is wholly inconsistent with the idea of his having taken possession as a receiver. Am I then, after so many years, to assume this to be a case wherein the title is to be rejected? My opinion is, that the defendant has, by his own acts, precluded himself from repudiating the possession. This being the case, he must pay the purchase-money into court, and also pay the usual interest.

Motion granted.

SNOW V. HALE.

Practice—Infant defendant—Decree.

The plaintiff in a suit, after having received notice that H. H. an infant defendant, had arrived at age, and did not continue to appear by her former attorney, proceeded, nevertheless, to obtain a decree against her, as though she were still an infant, together with other defendants in the suit: Held, that the defendant H. H. had a right to make a new defence.

Harriet Hole, one of the defendants to the above suit, having attained her age of twenty-one years, now moved that she might be at liberty to put in a new and further answer to the bill. The bill had been originally filed against her when she was an infant, to which she had put in her appearance by J. H. Wilson, her guardian. It appeared by affidavits that she came of age on the 13th of August, 1844, and on the 30th of the same month, she refused to allow W. Walsh, who had acted as the solicitor of her guardian, J. H. Wilson, to appear for her, and, in consequence of such refusal, he ceased thenceforth to act for her. On the 18th of November, 1844, W. Walsh was served with a copy of a subpoena to hear judgment as for Harriet Hale. Whereupon he returned to the plaintiff's solicitor the copy of the subpoena, accompanied with a letter, stating that H. Hole was of age, and that he, W. Walsh, no longer represented her as solicitor in the cause. Notwithstanding this notice, the cause proceeded to a hearing on the 18th of March, 1845, and a decree was then made, which was expressed to be in a suit between the plaintiff and Harriet Hale, and other infants, by J. H. their guardian, and other defendants. A motion was now made by Harriet Hale, that, having attained her age of twenty-one years, she might be at liberty to put in a new and further answer to the plaintiff's bill.

James Parker appeared for the motion, and on behalf of his client, urged her not being properly served with the subpoena, as she ought to have been, formed no ground for taking away her right of making the present application, to which she would have been entitled had she been an infant at the time when the decree was made; and whatever decree there may be in respect of others, there was none against the defendant.

Cases cited: Kelsall v. Kelsall, 2 M. & K. 409; Cecil v. Lord Salisbury, 2 Vern. 224.

Bethell, in opposition, contended that the case was still stronger than that of Powys v. Lord Mansfield, 6 Sim. 637; that had the defendant made the same application several months before the hearing, as she might have done, she would have been perfectly regular, and might have claimed to be heard; but instead of so doing, she suffers the decree to be made; thus claiming the option of refusing to be bound by the decree, if it were against her; but accepting the decree, and taking the benefit of it, if it be in her favour.

Stuart appeared for other defendants in the same interest.

J. Parker, in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The Court must, in the first place, consider how the decree has been obtained; it was expressed to be made between the plaintiff and Harriet Hale, an infant, and the other infants by their guardian, although no person at the time answered such description. I am of opinion that there has been no decree against this person, and she had therefore a right to make this application. The subpoena, which was intended to apply to the infant, was actually returned to the plaintiff's solicitor, who must have been aware of the facts; and yet the decree was drawn up as if the subpoena had been properly served.

Bethell.—Perhaps your Honor will consider whether, instead of the present application, the defendant ought not to have moved to set aside the decree, which, unless it were a decree against the late infant, it is no decree against any one.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Very possibly the plaintiff may have placed himself in difficult circumstances, but still I shall give the defendant liberty to make a new defence, as though no decree had been made against her.

ROLLS COURT.

Re WHILDON.

Practice—Delivery of solicitor's bill—Affidavit.

Where an order for the delivery of a solicitor's bill has not been complied with, and a four-day order is then applied for, the application ought to be accompanied with an affidavit of non-delivery.

On the 4th of April last, an order was made on the petition of Mr. Edward Poole, for the delivery of the bill of costs of his solicitor, Mr. William Wheldon, within a fortnight from the date of the service of the order. The bill not being delivered in the time, Gardner now applied for a four-day order to deliver it.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—Have you an affidavit of non-delivery?

Gardner.—No.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—Then let one be produced; the order would be irregular, if it should turn out that there had been delivery.

THOMAS V. GWYNNE.

Practice—Costs—Married woman, conveyance by—Purchasing consent.

An order was made in a creditor's suit for the sale of certain real estates, and for the conveyance thereof by certain parties, among whom was a married woman, who refused to consent. The plaintiff and the purchaser bought the consent for a certain sum each. The Taxing-Master would not, without the sanction of the Court, allow the sum paid by the plaintiff in the bill of costs of sale, &c. and the Court refused to make an order.

This was a creditor's suit, and certain real estates had been sold by a decree of the Court (5 Law T. 327, 342, and 6 Law T. 187), and had been ordered to be conveyed by certain parties interested therein after payment of debts, among others, by Thomas W. Howell and wife. The latter being a married woman, could not be compelled to convey, and being unwilling to do so, the plaintiff and the purchaser had agreed to pay her 15l. each to purchase her consent. The plaintiff added the 15l. paid by him to the bill of costs of sale, &c.; but the Taxing-Master would not allow the item without the sanction of the Court, as it was not properly costs.

Piggott now applied to the Court to direct the allowance of the item.—The purchaser had paid his money into Court, and there was an order for the distribution thereof among the several claimants, and it would not be necessary, therefore, to come to the Court again.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—How can I sanction the application of part of the money for the purpose of inducing her to comply?

Piggott.—The money can't be got out of court till she consents to convey; and a married woman is not compellable to do so; if that were not so, I should not ask the order.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—It is asking me to give away other people's money to a person who has no right to it, to induce her to give a consent which it is her duty to give, and for not giving which, she is, perhaps, punishable. What right has she to ask for 15l.? I cannot grant the motion.

Friday, May 22, and Friday, June 12.

SOUGHTON V. MARRIOTT.

Practice—Reading in one cause depositions taken in another—Irregularity—Publication.

A defendant in one suit instituted another himself as plaintiff; publication passed in the first cause, and was enlarged in the second, with the consent of the plaintiff, without prejudice, however, to its being set down for hearing; the plaintiff in the second cause having examined his witnesses, obtained the common order to read in the one cause "the depositions taken" in the other, "saving all just exceptions;" the order was held regular, though the examination of witnesses in the second cause was going on, and publication might happen not to pass therein before the hearing of the first cause; and a motion to discharge the order for irregularity was refused with costs, but with an intimation by the Court that application might be made to the judge before whom the cause was, to relieve from payment thereof on merits.

In this cause, which is an administration suit, now before Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, the bill was filed on the 7th of June, 1846, and publication passed on the 1st of the present month of May, and subpoena to hear judgment was served for the 31st. Thomas Flight, one of the defendants in the cause, and an incumbrancer on a share of one of the legacies of the residuary interest under the will of Thomas Phillips, the testator in the cause, filed his bill on the 18th of June, 1846, in Vice-Chancellor Wigram's Court, to carry out the trusts of the will; and on the 20th of April last publication in the second cause (Flight v. Marriott) was enlarged, with the consent of the plaintiff, but without prejudice to the cause being set down in the meantime, and it will not now pass till the 20th of June. Flight began to examine his witnesses in his own cause on the 25th of April, and finished on the 6th of May, on which day he obtained the common order to read in the one cause the depositions "taken" in the other, "saving all just exceptions." This order it was now sought to set aside for irregularity.

Kindersley (with him Cooke), for the motion.—Publication has passed in this cause, and it will come on to be heard on the 1st of June, and publication will not pass in Flight v. Marriott, before Vice-Chancellor Wigram, till the 20th of June, and yet Flight has asked to use in this cause depositions taken in the other, though the examinations will be going on till the 20th of June, and could not be used in Flight v. Marriott itself, the cause in which they are taken. At the time the order was made some of the witnesses were on cross-examination; and depositions are in esse, and not "taken" till publication has passed, and the order to read them ought not to be made till after publication. [THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—Does "taken" mean "having been taken," or "to be taken," past or future? The question is, is it irregular to make an order to read depositions in one cause not already taken in the other?] Depositions taken in cause B, sought to be used in cause A, should be such as could be used at the time in cause B itself. If publication had passed at the time the order was made, it would be regular.

Turner, with him Rogers, contra.—Mr. Flight only asks to be at liberty to use the depositions partially, that is the depositions of the witnesses he has examined, or the depositions taken in Flight v. Marriott, at the time the order was made. And even these we may not be able to use unless publication is passed in our cause before the hearing of the other. The only difficulty is, we run the risk of not having the depositions we ask for. The form of the order is right (Hinde and Turner Pract.), and the clause "saving just exceptions" would at the hearing entitle the other side to make any exception as to the reading of the evidence which might be necessary; and the judge could determine as to the admissibility of the evidence, though not as to the regularity of the order, or he could reject the evidence altogether. It is said the order may delay the hearing of this cause, but that is not so, for the judge may go on if he likes, notwithstanding the order obtained. The defendants, Sourton and Marriott, who are now moving to discharge the order, abandoned the application to enlarge, because they could not get it without agreeing to set down the cause; the other defendants applying agreed to its being set down, and got the order to enlarge. Both causes are set down, and the question is, whether, when a cause is set down, the order to read depositions can be obtained? The order is of course, and may be got at any stage of the cause, "saving just exceptions."

Kindersley, in reply.—Justice requires that if there are two suits about the same matter, the evidence in the one may be used in the other, and the order for that purpose is a common order. The object of the rule is to save expense. You may have a prospective order to examine in both, or you may have the depositions taken in the one used in the other; but here it is ordered that all depositions to be taken are to be used. On the 6th of May last, a defendant cross-examined Flight's witnesses, and my clients examined in chief, and yet it is said it is a proper order to read a part of the evidence; but if you read a part, you must read the whole, and if you do not, it is a "just exception." The order therefore is irregular, and ought to be discharged.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The question arises as to an order to read in one cause depositions taken in another, publication having passed in the one and not in the other. It is common to read in one cause depositions taken in another, and there is no reason why an order to do so may not be obtained even before the examination of the witnesses; and it is common enough after publication. There is this difference, however, in this case, that publication has passed in one cause while the witnesses are being examined in the other; and it is asked that depositions in the cause in which proceedings are going on may be used in the other in which publication has passed. But the effect of this is to let in the examinations of witnesses taken after. The words "saving just exceptions," go to the circumstances under which the order was made. Just consider; Flight says he has examined several witnesses, and then gets an order which does not prevent him from examining more, though it appears he has concluded his examination. There is some difference of opinion as to the practice, and I shall make inquiries; but if I discharge the order, it will not preclude Mr. Flight from applying for an order on other grounds.

June 12.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS intimated his opinion, on due consideration of the case, to be, that the order was not irregular; and he refused the motion with costs; but he said he thought it a case in which application might be made to the judge in the other court to consider whether there might not be some means of relieving the applicant from the costs.

Friday, June 12.

THOMAS V. SELBY.

Practice—Service of bill on formal parties.

Where a bill has been served on formal parties, and is afterwards amended in consequence of a defendant, who had no interest, answering and disclaiming service of the original bill on formal parties, will not be considered service of the amended bill.

In this case, Thomas Collins (see p. 155, supra), having been found, was duly served with a copy of the bill, and he put in his answer and disclaimed all interest; whereupon the bill was amended.

Welford now moved that service of a copy of the original bill might be considered good service of a copy of the amended bill on certain formal parties thereto, the amendment being so trifling; but

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS refused the motion, but gave leave, under the 28th Order of May last, to serve the copy of the amended bill in a reasonable time.

RE FREMINGTON SCHOOL, Ex parte WARD.

Trustees of a charity—Removal of a schoolmaster. Where, by a will, a testator gave to trustees certain hereditaments upon trust to permit any person who might be a schoolmaster of a certain school to occupy the same, and to receive the rents and profits thereof; and also gave to the same trustees two rent-charges of 10l. each upon trust to pay the same to the said schoolmaster; and gave the right of election of the schoolmaster to the trustees, and also gave them the power from time to time to displace such person who might be the schoolmaster upon any neglect or misbehaviour in such master, or other just cause for which they or the greater number of them should agree upon and think fit to displace such master, it was held, that the trustees, in displacing a master, were bound to exercise their power according to those principles of right which are universal, and to those general rules applicable to the administration of justice which pervade the entire system of English law.

This was a petition presented under the 52 Geo. 3, c. 101, by William Ward and James Clarkson, on behalf of themselves and all other the inhabitants of the parish of Grinton, in the North Riding of the county of York; and it prayed that it might be declared that the petitioner, Ward, was still entitled to the office of schoolmaster of the endowed school of Fremington, in that parish; and that the electors, and especially the respondents, Messrs. Wyvill, Tardy, Surtees, and Orde, might be ordered to continue him in his office; and that they and all other the electors might be restrained from prosecuting any proceedings for ejecting him from his office, and that the respondents might pay the costs of the petition. James Hutchinson, by his will, dated the 3rd of February, 1643, after reciting that he was seised in fee of certain lands and hereditaments, and which he intended should be employed for the better maintenance of an able, learned, and religious schoolmaster, for the better teaching and educating of the children and youth of the town and township of Fremington, and the rest of the parish of Grinton for ever, gave and bequeathed the said dwelling-house and school-house thereunto adjoining, together with the said close called Langley Croft, to certain persons therein named, and their heirs and assigns for ever, upon the trust and confidence, and to the intent and purpose, that they, their heirs and assigns, should permit and suffer such person or persons as he should thereafter in his lifetime nominate and place to be schoolmaster there, to occupy and enjoy the said dwelling-house, school-house, and close before mentioned, during so long a time as such person or persons so to be nominated and placed should continue schoolmaster there, and that afterwards they should permit and suffer him who should be schoolmaster for the time being for ever to occupy and enjoy the said premises, and to take and receive the issues and profits thereof, so long as he should be or continue schoolmaster there. And the testator gave and bequeathed to the same trustees and their heirs and assigns, upon the trusts thereafter mentioned and expressed, the annual rent of 10l. to be issuing out of all other the testator's messuages, lands, and tenements, in Fremington aforesaid; and he gave to the said trustees another rent-charge of 10l. out of his lands in another parish, and directed that the said rents should be paid half-yearly. The testator then directed that his said trustees should from time to time, and at all times thereafter, pay the said several rents of 10l. to such person or persons as should be by him nominated and appointed schoolmaster of the said school as aforesaid, and to every other schoolmaster, for and during such time as he or they should continue and be schoolmaster there for the time, in such manner as he had thereby formerly limited the profits of the said hereditaments before mentioned. After making other provisions, the testator directed that, after the death and deaths of such person or persons as should be by him nominated and placed in the said school as schoolmaster there, the schoolmaster for the time being should from time to time be elected and placed by his brother Richard Hutchinson, and his heirs, and others the owners of the messuages and lands at Fremington aforesaid, the parson of Spennithorne, the vicar of Grinton, the dean of Middleham, the parson of Richmond, the parson of Wensley, and the parson of Marske for the time being, or by the greater number of them; and the testator's will was, that the greater number of the persons so appointed to elect such new masters of the said school, after the death or departure of such master or masters which should be by him nominated and placed in the said school, should have power from time to time, from and after the testator's death, to displace any such person or persons who at any time in his lifetime, or at or after his death, should be elected and placed master in the said school, upon any neglect or misbehaviour in such master, or other just cause, for which they or the greater number of them should agree upon, and think fit to displace such master, and then choose and place another master there from time to time, as they or the greater number of them should think fit and convenient.

From the petition it appeared that Ward was appointed master of this school on the 5th of April, 1823. In 1832, in consequence of quarrels between them, Ward and his wife separated, he agreeing to allow her 26l. per annum. In April 1842, the Rev. Elias Tardy became vicar of Grinton, and in the following July called a meeting of the electors of the school, which was attended by himself, the Rev. Edward Wyvill, the parson of Spennithorne, and the Rev. Robert Meek, the parson of Richmond, and certain charges were made against the petitioner, but they were not substantiated. In September 1842, the petitioner's wife and daughter came to reside with him again, and continued until the middle of the following January, when they both left him. The wife having applied to the board of guardians for relief, the petitioner made her an additional allowance, and on the 22nd of April, 1844, she wrote to the petitioner, threatening that, if he did not give the daughter some assistance, she would apply, through the clergy, to the proper authorities. The wife made a charge against the petitioner, to Mr. Tardy, of gross indecency towards his own daughter, M. M. Ward, in October, November, and December, 1842, and the petitioner's son, W. T. Ward, supported his mother in the charge. On the 30th of May, 1844, Mr. Wyvill and Mr. Surtees, two of the electors, at the request of Mr. Tardy, met him at Fremington to investigate the charge, and, assisted by Mr. Simpson, a solicitor, they examined the wife, daughter, and son, but the other three electors (Messrs. Metcalfe, Wood, and Kendall) were not summoned to the meeting. The questions on behalf of the petitioner were put through the chairman, and not by the petitioner or his solicitor, Mr. Thairwall. At this meeting, however, the persons present not forming a majority of the electors, nothing was decided upon. On the 10th of August, 1844, the petitioner received a notice, signed by Messrs. Wyvill, Surtees, Tardy, and Orde, summoning him to attend on the 17th, a meeting to investigate the charges. The meeting took place on the 17th of August, and the minutes of the 30th of May were read, and one additional witness examined against the petitioner, and the former witnesses on behalf of the petitioner were re-examined. On the same day the petitioner was served with an order of dismissal, signed by Messrs. Wyvill, Tardy, Surtees, and Orde, the same being stated to be "for divers good causes them thereto especially moving."

Russell and G. L. Russell, for the petitioner, contended that the proceedings against Ward had been irregular, and that, therefore, he was entitled to be reinstated.

Bagshawe, for Mr. Metcalfe, one of the electors, supported the petition.

Sir F. Simpkinson and Biehner, for the respondents, cited the Darlington School case (Law Journal vol. xii. p. 124, and vol. xiv. p. 67.)

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This petition is presented under the Charity Petition Act, and seeks relief against the petitioner's removal from the office of schoolmaster, which he held, upon a private charitable foundation in Yorkshire, the majority of the gentlemen styled electors, who are to be considered to be in the nature of governors of the charity (I do not say visitors), having displaced him, as he contends, unduly and improperly; but as the gentlemen composing that majority consider as being duly and properly. The first question for consideration seems to be, whether the petitioner was removable arbitrarily and at pleasure, or at discretion; whether his position is analogous to that of a servant, who, with or without notice, according to the circumstances, may be discharged without a reason assigned, or without a reason existing? This must depend upon the language used by the founder of the charity in his will. [His Honour then read those parts of the will which related to this charity, and proceeded as follows:—] I cannot accede to the argument that in the case of a schoolmaster, appointed under an instrument worded as this will is, the principles upon which the Darlington School case, cited during the argument, was decided, are applicable. In the present instance, as it appears to me, the master is not removable at the will or discretion of the electors, or any of them. He is made removable only for neglect, misbehaviour, or just cause. The electors, or a majority of them, are, in the event of neglect, misbehaviour, or just cause, to decide upon the question of the removal of the master, not whether, for any cause or reason, he shall be removed. Assuming that it was intended to be left to them to decide upon the matter of fact, I think that it was not left to them to decide upon matter of law. Assuming that they might decide, for example, that forgery or adultery, being by law a just cause, had been committed by him in fact, and that so he was removable, I think that they could not decide upon the ground of his refusal to wear a black coat, or to teach the Chinese language, the refusal being proved against him and not denied, that he should be removed, that not being a just cause. The petitioner, Mr. Ward, was many years ago appointed schoolmaster upon this foundation, and, as I conceive, he acquired, upon his appointment, a freehold, or an interest in the nature of a freehold, and the revenue belonging to it; whether equitable or legal, it is not necessary to inquire. Of course I do not say that he became an irremovable master; on the contrary, I assume the competency of the electors, or a majority of them, to remove him for just cause. This power, however, they were, as I conceive, bound to exercise not otherwise than judicially. I do not say that they were to do so in any technical manner, or according to any particular formalities, but judicially, in the sense of proceeding according to those principles of right which are universal, and to those general rules applicable to the administration of justice which pervade the entire system of English law. Thus, it was not competent for them to discharge the master arbitrarily, nor was it competent to them to adopt against him, in my judgment, any mode of proceeding substantially irregular. The counsel for the respondents opposing the petition, contend that the electors, or a majority of them, are to be considered as visitors, and that their acts are to be treated upon that footing. To this I am unable to accede; and I conceive that the act of removing or discharging a schoolmaster upon this charitable foundation, by the electors or a majority of them, is examinable in this Court, at least upon certain principles and within certain limits. I suppose, or rather I wish to be considered as assuming, without however deciding, that the mere circumstance of this Court believing witnesses, who were disbelieved by the electors or a majority of them, or vice versa, would not, and that the mere circumstance of this Court dissenting from a conclusion as to a matter of fact drawn by the electors or a majority of them, from evidence, or the mere fact of falsification, by testimony produced before this Court for the first time, and not before any of the electors, of evidence that was before them, and believed by them, also would not be sufficient to induce the Court to reinstate a schoolmaster removed or displaced by a majority of the electors in a judicial manner. The question then appears to arise whether, consistently with the views which I have stated, there is here any solid ground upon which to rest a dissent; I mean an effectual and practical dissent, on the part of the Court, from the proceedings of the 17th of August, 1844, and from their result and effect. After an attentive consideration of the argument and the evidence, I am of opinion that there is; a conclusion which I think is supported by the following reasons, which may or may not be all considered sufficient, although they are so in my judgment. In the first place, an affidavit has been made by Mr. Tardy, who became vicar of Grinton late in 1841, or very early in 1842, and who was a party to the ineffectual proceedings of the 4th of July, 1842; proceedings, perhaps, irregular as well as ineffectual, and who appears, certainly, from a time preceding that month, to have formed the belief, well or ill founded, that the petitioner was a person so objectionable as a schoolmaster, that his continuance in the office was very far from desirable. [His Honour then read Mr. Tardy's affidavit, which it is unnecessary to state here.] It appears, then, by this affidavit, that Mr. Tardy, upon statements which had been made to him ex parte, without having heard the accused, or conferred or communicated with him upon the subject, the accused being his parishioner, and to be afterwards tried by Mr. Tardy as one of his judges, permitted his mind to receive, in effect, a conviction of the guilt of the accused previously to the trial, inquiry, or investigation of the 30th of May, 1844. In the second place this proceeding took place before three electors only, the total number of electors being seven, and was irregular as taking place before parties who were without jurisdiction of any kind. Thirdly, the accused had not liberty upon that occasion, by himself or by his legal advisers, to cross-examine the witness, who, if not the only, was the chief witness produced against him, and, I suppose, the most important witness. The questions in cross-examination had to be put, and were put, through the chairman. The defence was, in my opinion, unduly interfered with, and I cannot say it was not impeded prejudicially to the accused. Fourthly, the documents of the 30th of May, 1844, entered upon the book of proceedings relating to the charity, and signed by Mr. Wyvill, who was a party to the affair of the 4th of July, 1842, by Mr. Surtees and by Mr. Tardy, records the unanimous and unhesitating decision by those three gentlemen of the petitioner's guilt, and their opinion that he ought to be dismissed. Thus three out of the four judges who tried the petitioner on the 17th of the following August, coming to that trial under a recorded declaration on their part of their opinion that he was guilty, could not certainly come to it with equal or unbiassed minds. This expression I desire to be understood as not using harshly or disrespectfully. Fifthly, the entry of the 30th of May, 1844, is the last in the book; and there is not, so far as I am aware, any judicial record, or judicial minute, of the proceedings of the 17th of August. Sixthly, it is, I think, a just inference from the affidavits upon the subject, that the defence, so far as relates to cross-examination, was, in the same manner as on the 30th of May, impeded on the 17th of August; less favourably to the accused, or less strictly, or less adversely, it is probable, if not certain, but still to some extent impeded, and, as I conceive, unduly; nor have I had the means of saying that it was not so materially. Seventhly, with regard to the effect of any consent or submission which, on the 30th of May or the 17th of August, there may have been on the part of the petitioner or Mr. Thairwall, I must say that, in estimating the weight or value of it, the inequality of position, at least, on that occasion, between the judges on the one hand, and the accused and his attorney on the other, appears to me to be a matter not to be overlooked, a remark which I make in no disrespectful sense. Eighthly, by the notice or summons of the 10th of August, Mr. Simpson's letter or notice of the 5th of August must be taken, I think, to have been effectually waived. Ninthly, if the notice or summons of the 10th of August contained any charge or language sufficiently specific, the only charge which it contains in language of that kind appears to me to be a charge of indecent exposure of the petitioner's person to his daughter. The other charges in the paper of the 10th of August are expressed too vaguely and too loosely, to be entitled, in my opinion, to be considered as charges effectually or validly made. I agree that the word "neglect" is there, but it is not accompanied by any date or by any statement of any facts of neglect, or the kind of neglect meant to be imputed. Tenthly, the paper which, loosely worded, as I have said, states investigations only as the object of the meeting of the 17th August, not mentioning that at that meeting the removal of the petitioner from his office would or might take place, or be proposed, must, I think, be construed as only, or at the utmost, notice of the object, meaning, or intention which, before the meeting, either the petitioner, or the dean of Middleham, or Mr. Kendall, or Mr. Metcalfe had. I think that neither the petitioner, nor any of the three absent electors, ought to be considered as having, previously to the meeting, been apprized that at that meeting such a step would or might be resorted to. Whether it was material or immaterial that the petitioner should be so apprized, I do not say; but, in my judgment, it was material that some or all of the three absent electors should be so apprized. According to my view of this case, they had not the opportunity afforded to them, which, as I think, ought to have been afforded to them, of consulting and being consulted, delivering their opinion and sentiments, and giving their voices upon the question of removing or displacing, or not removing or displacing, the schoolmaster. Eleventhly, the instrument of dismissal, under the hands and seals of the four electors present, on the 17th August, which was served on the petitioner on that same day, and had probably, I do not say certainly, but probably, judging from the internal and other evidence, been brought ready prepared, I do not say signed, to the meeting, does not contain or express any adjudication or conviction of crime, neglect, misbehaviour, or any specific cause of removal. It merely says, "for divers good causes so hereunto specially moving." It mentions, in a documentary sense, the proceedings of the school, but the book does not appear to contain any record of the trial and the transactions of the 17th of August, nor am I aware, beyond the paper in question, that there is any such record. Twelfthly, as to the notice of the 17th of August, none of the three absent electors appear to have been consulted, or to have concurred in it, nor to have had the opportunity of considering it; and I think that if there is any weight in this, it bears, especially when compared with the documents of the 10th and 17th of August, in favour of the petitioner's case, rather than otherwise. Of these reasons, all probably, or all certainly, are not of equal weight, and more than one of them can be rejected without affecting the conclusion. It is sufficient for me to say that upon all or some of the considerations which I have stated, I think the order, the minutes of which will be read, is the proper one to be made on this petition. "Declare that the notices and order of the 30th of May, the 10th of August, and 17th of August, 1844, are ineffectual and void, and that the petitioner, Mr. Ward, has not been duly and effectually removed and displaced from his office of schoolmaster. This order of the Court to be without prejudice to the question, whether there has been any criminal conduct on the part of the petitioner, or whether there exists or not sufficient ground upon which the respondents, or any of them, may hereafter lawfully displace or remove the petitioner from his office in a due and regular manner; the petition in all other respects to stand over until the 3rd day of November next, and either party to have liberty to apply, notwithstanding this order of the Court, and, notwithstanding the petition, the respondents are to be at liberty to take any proceeding for the removal of the petitioner from his office for any just cause, if any, which it would have been competent to them to take if the proceedings of May and August, 1844, had not taken place, and the petitioner had not been removed. The parties respectively are to be at liberty to bring under the consideration of the Court on the 3rd of November next, when this petition is to be again mentioned, any statement, proceeding, or circumstances concerning the petitioner in respect of his office of schoolmaster, which between that day and the present time shall have taken place."

MORRISON v. MARTIN.

Will—Construction—Legacy.

Where a testator through his will shews an intention to benefit the children of certain relations whom he names, and describes them numerically, without naming them, the Court will hold the intention to be for the benefit of all the children, although they may exceed the number mentioned in the will.

James Hannay, by his will, dated 7th October, 1843, devised, amongst other bequests, as follows:— "To my nephew, John Turnbull, and his sister, Mrs. Primrose Wood, I bequeath 250*l.* each; to my nephew, James Douglas, I bequeath 200*l.* and my Peruvian bond for 500*l.*; to my nephew, William Martin, and his sister Isabella, I bequeath 200*l.* each; to my niece, Mrs. Conbrough, I bequeath 250*l.*; to my nieces, Mrs. Vise, Mrs. Stubbs, Mrs. Roy, and Mrs. Ward, I bequeath 200*l.* each; to my two grand-nieces, daughters of my late niece, Mrs. Emily King, and to my grand-nephew, Peter Kait, and his sister Jessie, and to the two children of my late nephews, James Martin and Andrew Douglas, I bequeath 100*l.* each;" and devised the residue to other parties therein mentioned; and appointed James Ruckin, who renounced, and the plaintiffs, his executors, and died in 1844. James Martin, named in the will, left three children; Andrew Douglas, also named in the will, left two children, all of whom were living at the date of the will and death of testator. Disputes arose between the friends of these five children, who are infants, and the residuary legatees, in respect to the construction of the will; the former contending that each of the five children are entitled to one hundred pounds, or, at all events, two members of each family are so entitled. The residuary legatees contended that the gift was void for uncertainty, or, if not, that only one child of each nephew was entitled to 100*l.* The bill was filed by the executors, to have the estate of the testator administered in court.

Walker appeared for the plaintiffs.

Wood for the defendants.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Declare in this cause that all the children of James Martin and Andrew Douglas alive at the date of the will and at the death of the testator, are entitled to a legacy of 100*l.* each, and the cost of all parties to be paid out of the residuary estate.

WILD v. WOODYATE.

Married woman—Separate use—Anticipation—Creditors.

A married woman entitled to property to her separate use for life, remainder to such uses as she should appoint, may, during coverture, exercise her power of appointment, and, in resettling the estate, may restrain her own power over her life estate, by the introduction of the usual clause against anticipation, which will be binding on herself and all subsequent creditors.

By indenture of the 29th June, 1816, Mrs. Anne Pitt, the mother of the defendant, Mrs. Woodyate, had a power to appoint the sum of 3,000*l.* in favour of her daughter. By deed-poll of 6th May, 1840, Mrs. Anne Pitt, reciting her power, and that her daughter had married the defendant Woodyate in 1839, and that no settlement had been executed, exercises her power of appointment, and directs and appoints the interest of the said sum of 3,000*l.* to be paid to her daughter (after her own decease) for her life, for her sole and separate use, and after her decease to apply the principal sum of 3,000*l.* to such uses as her daughter should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment, to the executors or administrators of her daughter. There was no clause introduced into the deed of May 1840, restraining Mrs. Woodyate from anticipating the income of the fund. By deeds executed on the 13th of May, 1840, between Mrs. Woodyate, of the first part; Woodyate, her husband, of the second part; Mrs. Anne Pitt, of the third part; and Williams and Sorrel (the trustees of the 3,000*l.*), of the fourth part; Mrs. Anne Pitt and Mrs. Woodyate direct and appoint Williams and Sorrel to pay the sum of 500*l.* due from Woodyate and wife to Evans, and, after the death of Mrs. Anne Pitt, to pay the dividends of the remainder of the 3,000*l.* to Mrs. Woodyate for her life for her separate use, without power of anticipation, and then to her husband for life, remainder to the children, if any, as they should jointly appoint; and if no children, then to such uses as Mrs. Woodyate should by deed or will appoint, and in default, in trust for the next of kin of Mrs. Woodyate. On the 19th of April, 1841, Woodyate and his wife executed a promissory note, whereby they promised to pay Thomas Wild the sum of 148*l.* twelve months after date. Woodyate was unable to pay the note when it became due, and Wild filed the present suit to have the amount paid out of the income of Mrs. Woodyate, derived from the residue of the 3,000*l.* Mrs. Anne Pitt being dead.

Wood and Roundell Palmer for the plaintiff.

Romilly for some of the defendants.

Willcock for the trustees of the wife and children.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—There can be no doubt that a married woman can exercise all the powers of a feme sole over property settled to her separate use, consistent with the deed under which she takes, and that she may be restrained in the exercise of those powers in a manner which the law does not allow in the limitation of estates to men; thus the enjoyment of a life estate to the separate use of a married woman may be deprived of the usual incidents attendant upon such an estate by the introduction of a clause against anticipation. Mrs. Woodyate, in this case, though a married woman, had, under the deed of 6th May, 1840, all the powers of a feme sole to carry out the limitations there expressed, and under those to execute the deed of 13th May, 1840, containing the clause against anticipation and the other limitations there expressed. This deed is clearly binding on all subsequent creditors, and prevents her life estate from being charged or alienated, and, therefore, no act of his could subject her life estate to the payment of the promissory note in question. I shall not give any opinion what effect a reference by Mrs. Woodyate to this specific property, when the promissory note was executed, or had there been any use made of the prior settlement to defraud the creditor, would have had in affecting the principal sum, as there is no evidence of any such conduct.

Saturday, July 4.

BAKER v. DOWTON.

Sale to plaintiff without reference to Master.

This was a petition of the plaintiff, who had the conduct of the cause, for an order to the Master to accept him as a purchaser of one of the lots directed to be sold under the decree of the Court. The estate had been put up for sale by auction in lots, and the Master put reserved prices upon the several lots. At the sale the bidding for the lot to which the petitioner referred did not amount to the reserved price, and it was, therefore, not sold. After the sale the plaintiff made an offer to the Master for the purchase of the lot not sold. This offer was higher than any one else had bid, and higher than the reserved price put down at the sale. The Master approved of the offer, but refused to complete the sale without the special order of the Court. The property comprised in the sale belonged to a man aged seventy years for his life, and after his death it was limited to his children equally; the children were all adult, but should their father have any more children, they would be entitled to their share of the property. The father and children now living all approved of the offer made by the plaintiff.

Wood appeared for the petitioner; and Shapter, Sidebottom, and Sandys for the other parties.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—There is some difficulty in making this order without a special reference to the Master to inquire into the facts. The petitioner in this case has had the management of the cause, and consequently the production of the facts upon which the Master came to his conclusion as to the value upon which he fixed the reserved price, there is therefore strong ground for caution on the part of the Court in granting such an order as here prayed. However, as all the parties are represented and adult, and they approve of the order, a special reference may be saved under such circumstances. There is, however, the fact of after-born children to be considered, who would become entitled; but you say such an event is almost a physical impossibility from the age and infirmity of the father: of this, however, I must have an affidavit; and on your producing that to the Court, you may take the order as prayed in your petition.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Friday, June 5.

THATCHER v. SIR RICHARD ENGLAND, Knight.

*Some property of the defendant having been stolen, the defendant published a handbill, headed "30*l.* reward," which, after enumerating the stolen articles, concluded—"The above sum will be paid by the adjutant of the 41st regiment on recovery of the property and conviction of the offender, or in proportion to the amount recovered." The plaintiff sued for the reward, and declared upon this as a promise to pay the sum mentioned "to such person as should cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted, and the said property to be recovered," and averred that he caused the said offender to be apprehended, and that by the means, evidence, and information of the plaintiff, the offender was convicted and the property recovered. It was found that the plaintiff did not give the first information as to the party committing the robbery, but that he was most active and mainly instrumental in procuring the recovery of the property and the conviction of the offender. Held, that he was not entitled to recover.*

This was an action of assumpsit. The declaration set out that certain goods and chattels of the defendant were feloniously stolen from the officers' quarters of the Infantry Barracks at Canterbury, and that the defendant thereupon caused and procured a certain advertisement, handbill, and placard to be printed and published, headed "30*l.* reward;" and whereby, after stating that the said goods had been so stolen as aforesaid, the defendant did promise and undertake that the said sum of 30*l.* should and would be paid by the adjutant of her Majesty's 41st regiment, on the recovery of the said property of the defendant and conviction of the offender, or in proportion to the amount recovered, to such person as should cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted, and the said property to be recovered. The declaration then averred, that the plaintiff did cause the said offender, to wit, one W. W. to be apprehended for the said felony, and that the said W. W. was, in due course of law, tried for the said felony, and was upon the said trial, upon and by means of the evidence and information of the plaintiff, found guilty thereof and duly sentenced; and that the said property of the defendant, so stolen as aforesaid, was recovered by the defendant by and through the means, evidence, and information of the plaintiff, but that neither the adjutant nor the defendant had paid, &c.

Pleas—1, Non assumpsit; 2 to 6, Traverses of all the material allegations in the declaration. At the trial before Coleridge, J. at the Summer Assizes, 1845, for the county of Kent, a verdict was found for the plaintiff; damages 25*l.*; subject to the opinion of the Court upon a special case.

The case found that the plaintiff was a policeman of Canterbury, and the defendant the colonel of the 41st regiment of infantry, which in the month of April, 1844, was quartered at Canterbury. On the 26th of that month the defendant was robbed of certain articles of jewellery, and immediately gave directions for publishing the following handbill:—

"£30 Reward.

"Stolen from the officers' quarters of the Infantry Barracks, Canterbury, on the night of April 26, 1844, the following articles, viz. One diamond ring, one old family ring, one purple topaz large ring set in small diamonds, one turquoise blue gold ring, one French enamel ring, money to the amount of 3*l.* one flat Geneva gold watch, with short gold chain and long hair chain. The above sum will be paid by the adjutant of the 41st regiment on recovery of the property, and conviction of the offender, or in proportion to the amount recovered."

The above articles were stolen by one W. W. who was tried, convicted and sentenced at the July Sessions for the City of Canterbury, 1844. On June 10 one Fitzgerald informed the sergeant of the 41st regiment that W. W. had asked him to lend him some money to enable him to go to London to dispose of the property he had stolen from the defendant. Up to that time no suspicion had attached to W. W. The sergeant gave information of this fact to the superintendent of police, but did not then see the plaintiff. On June 14 one Pickering gave information to Eppe, a policeman of the place where W. W. was to be found, but Eppe could not discover him. Later in the same day the plaintiff received information that W. W. was at a certain public house in Canterbury, and went in quest of him with two other policemen. They found him at another public-house, and seized him, and after much resistance the plaintiff searched him, and took from him two of the rings mentioned in the advertisement, and two pawnbroker's duplicates relating to other parts of the stolen property. The plaintiff immediately apprehended W. W. and afterwards went to London, traced the property, procured summonses for and summoned the pawnbrokers to attend before the magistrates at Canterbury, and brought the defendant to identify the articles. The case found that the plaintiff incurred much trouble and expense in bringing together the witnesses, the same forming no part of his ordinary duty as a policeman. The value of all the property lost amounted to 94*l.* 15*s.*; of this, property to the amount of 85*l.* 15*s.* was recovered and restored to the defendant. The jury found specially, that the plaintiff did not give the first information as to the party committing the robbery; and, secondly, that the plaintiff was most active, and mainly instrumental in procuring the recovery of the property and the conviction of W. W. The Court was to direct whether a verdict should be entered for any and for what sum, or, if necessary, to direct a nonsuit to be entered.

Shes, Serjt. (with him Horn) for the plaintiff.—The first question is, whether the plaintiff did that which would put him in a position to say, "I have done that for which you contracted to give the reward." That depends upon the advertisement, and the construction put upon it in the declaration. The cases ordinarily quoted upon the subject of rewards do not apply, because in them the promises are made to the persons who do particular things. (Williams v. Carwardine, 4 B. & Ad. 621; 1 N. & M. 418, S.C.; Lancaster v. Walsh, 4 M. & W. 16; England v. Davidson, 11 A. & E. 856; Smith v. Moore, 1 C. B. 438.) The words in the advertisement must mean that the money is to be paid to the person who brings about the recovery of the property and the conviction of the offender. [MAULE, J.—Very probably they were intended to elicit the betrayal of a secret not otherwise to be procured.] [TINDAL, C.J.—There were two persons who gave information before the plaintiff had any thing to do with the matter.] Yes, but every thing that the others said or did came to nothing, and failed until the matter was taken up by the plaintiff. But the money was only to be paid upon the recovery of the property and the conviction of the offender. The promise does not depend upon the giving information, but the words point to something very different. None of the other parties did anything amounting to a recovery of the property or the conviction of the offender. It does not appear by the case that Fitzgerald or Pickering were even so much as witnesses at the trial; then what could they have to do with the conviction of the offender? Then, as to the recovery of the property, part was taken from the person of W. W. by the plaintiff, after violent resistance; the rest was traced by duplicates taken by the plaintiff from W. W.'s person, the plaintiff being at all the trouble and expense of travelling to London, and tracing the duplicates there. The plaintiff is entitled to recover, unless the Court will determine that the promise was not binding upon the defendant at all, but was a mere delusive pretence, intended to procure exertions and not to require them.

Channell, Serjt. (with him Petersdorff), were not called upon.

TINDAL, C. J.—It is a very unfortunate thing that the advertisement was not framed with more certainty, because, from the doubt and uncertainty connected with its interpretation, a person may have been put to great trouble and expense, under the honest idea that he was entitled to be paid the reward offered. The question is, who is the person who is to be paid the reward? The advertisement, after describing the stolen property, and prefacing that description with the words "30*l.* reward," says, "The above sum will be paid on recovery of the property and conviction of the offender," not saying to whom it will be paid. The question is, what is the legal construction of this advertisement, and who is intended to be described? And it seems to me, that that person is the original and meritorious cause of the recovery of the property and the conviction of the offender; the person who first gives the information which leads to both of these. That person is not the present plaintiff, for he does not perform any act until long after information has been given to other parties. First, a person named Fitzgerald tells the serjeant of his regiment, and information is by him given to the superintendent of police. Then, on the 14th of June, another person, Pickering, gives information to Epps, a policeman. Epps endeavours to discover and apprehend him, but fails. Later in the same day the plaintiff appears, and he, with two other policemen, having learnt where the offender may be found, after some difficulty takes him into custody. No doubt the plaintiff does a great deal towards the recovery of the property, and the conviction of the offender; he summons the witnesses and marshals the proceedings of the trial. But is he the person who has all the merit of bringing about the recovery of the property and the conviction of the offender? No. If it had not been for Fitzgerald, neither the one nor the other would have taken place. On the other hand, if the plaintiff had failed, the other policeman, probably the same day, would have arrested the offender. After the track was once laid, and the information given, the plaintiff availed himself of it, and though late in the field was more successful than the rest.

COLTMAN, J.—We ought to construe these agreements as legal, and not honorary; because the party making them intends to bind himself legally. In order to entitle the plaintiff to recover, he must make out that he is solely entitled to sue. The difficulty has arisen, I dare say, because various persons have claimed the reward. I don't think the plaintiff as good a claimant as Fitzgerald. Perhaps they might sue jointly, but certainly not the plaintiff by himself.

MAULE, J.—The advertisement is silent as to the person to whom the reward is to be paid. In the cases cited it was held that an advertisement of this sort creates a legal obligation, although that at first was thought to be new law. I cannot find here, with any degree of certainty, who is the person to whom the money is to be paid. Perhaps it was intended that it should be divided among such persons as should, by information or otherwise, contribute to the recovery of the property and the conviction of the offender, in proportion to their services. That would be a reasonable way, and then a value might be set upon the information, the apprehending, and the other matters of the transaction. If any contract arises here, I think it must be somewhat of that kind, but that is not the contract laid in the declaration. Difficulties have often arisen in the cases of advertisements much more precise in their language, because often there is no one person who does that for which the reward is offered, but it is done in different degrees and proportions by different persons. One man finds out who the offender is, another where it is supposed he may be found; then he is not actually found at the first place, but then a third person gives some farther information by means of which he is taken. And then, though there is an intention to pay the money offered as a reward, yet the offerer is unwilling to pay more than one. Occasionally, in such cases, it is referred to the clerk of the peace or some other discreet person to distribute the money. That is the better plan, and is similar, I believe, to the practice adopted at the Home Office. In this case, however, there is a total absence of any words determining to whom the amount is to be paid; and the construction put upon the advertisement in the declaration is not the right one.

CRESSWELL, J.—I also am of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. The advertisement is in a very loose form, and certainly does not point out any particular person, or specify any particular service. It is very doubtful if the contract is properly described in the declaration. But if properly described, all the material averments are traversed; and I think upon those traverses the defendant would succeed. First, I think the plaintiff did not cause the offender to be apprehended: the soldier gave information of the important fact upon which he was apprehended. That information was carried by the sergeant to the policeman. Therefore, in some sense, Fitzgerald caused the apprehension; in some sense, the man who told where he was to be found caused the same thing. Again, did the plaintiff cause the offender to be convicted? Surely it was not his evidence only. The pawnbroker gave some important evidence. Probably the jury acted in part upon the evidence of the pawnbroker. Then, as before, too, the person who first set the thing in motion was partly the cause. In the same way, he did not solely cause the property to be recovered. This case is a good deal like that of Lancaster v. Walsh, 4 M. & W. 16. There the advertisement was, that "Whosoever would give information, whereby the property might be traced, should, on conviction of the parties, receive the reward;" and it was held to mean the person who first gave information by which the stolen property was traced to the robbers—the first person who set the inquirers upon the right track.

Judgment of nonsuit.

DOE dem. WOODALL and OTHERS v. WOODALL and ANOTHER.

T. M. by his will, after having devised real estates to his grandson T. L. with remainder in strict settlement to his issue, devised the same to his the testator's grandchildren, William, Samuel, Alice, and Hannah, if they should happen to be living at the time of the decease of T. L. "for and during the term of their natural lives, and the life of the survivor of them," as tenants in common, with remainder "to all and every the son and sons of the body and bodies" of his the testator's said grandchildren "lawfully to be begotten," and "the respective heirs of the body and bodies of all and every such son and sons lawfully issuing," remainder in tail in like manner to all the daughters of the testator's said grandchildren. There then followed the following clause: "And in case either of my said grandchildren, William, Samuel, Alice, and Hannah, shall happen to die, leaving no issue behind him, her, or them, then my will and meaning is, that all and singular the premises herein lastly devised, shall go and remain to the survivor of them, and the heirs of his or her body lawfully to be begotten in manner aforesaid." Held, that the words "in manner aforesaid" in the last clause referred to the preceding clause of the will, and that therefore the said grandchildren of the testator took only life estates under the will.

This was an action of ejectment brought to recover certain estates in the county of Monmouth, the facts of which were stated in a special case by the order of Coltman, J. and by the consent of the parties. In Michaelmas Term last the case was argued by Channell, Serjt. for the lessors of the plaintiff, and Byles, Serjt. for the defendant. The nature of the case fully appears in the judgment of the Court.

JUDGMENT.

COLTMAN, J. (in the absence of the late Chief Justice Tindal).—The question in this case is, whether, in the events which have happened, Samuel Llewellyn Morgan took an estate tail, or estate for life only, under the will of Thomas Morgan, in the lands in the parishes of Llanelleen and Llanover, in the county of Monmouth? If he took an estate for life only, judgment is then to be for the plaintiff; if in tail, then the defendant is entitled to the judgment. The will, after devising the lands in question to the testator's son, Samuel Morgan, for life, with remainder in strict settlement to his issue, with remainder to the testator's grandson, Thomas Llewellyn, with remainder in strict settlement to his issue, he devises as follows:—"And for default of such issue, then to the use of my grandchildren, William Llewellyn, Samuel Llewellyn, Alice Llewellyn, and Hannah Llewellyn (brothers and sisters of my said grandson, Thomas Llewellyn), if they shall happen to be living at the time of his decease, for and during the term of their natural lives, and the life of the survivor of them, to take as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants; and from and after their several deceases, and the decease of the survivor of them, the said William Llewellyn, Samuel Llewellyn, Alice Llewellyn, and Hannah Llewellyn, to the use and behoof of the first and all and every the son and sons of the body and bodies of my said grandchildren, William, Samuel, Alice, and Hannah, lawfully to be begotten, severally and successively, and in remainder, one after another, as they and every of them shall be in priority of birth and seniority of age, and of the several and respective heirs of the body and bodies of all and every such son and sons lawfully issuing, the elder of such sons and the heirs of his body lawfully issuing being always preferred, and to take before the younger of them; and the heirs of his and their body and bodies lawfully issuing to take as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants; and for want or in default of such issue, to the use of all and every the daughter and daughters of the bodies of my said grandchildren, William, Samuel, Alice, and Hannah, lawfully to be begotten, and the heirs of the bodies of such daughters respectively lawfully issuing, the daughters of each of my said grandchildren, William, Samuel, Alice, and Hannah, if more than one, to take as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants; and in case of the death and failure of some or any one or more of the said daughters of my said grandchildren, all and every the share and shares of her or them so dying, when and so often as it shall so happen, shall go, remain, and inure to the survivor and survivors and other and others of the said daughters, and the heirs of the body and bodies of such surviving and other daughter and daughters respectively, such surviving daughter, if more than one, to take also in equal parts and shares as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, and if all such daughters but one shall die without issue, or if there shall happen to be but one daughter of the body of my said grandchildren lawfully to be begotten, then to the use of such only surviving daughter, and the heirs of her body lawfully issuing. And in case either of my said grandchildren, William, Samuel, Alice, and Hannah, shall happen to die leaving no issue behind him, her, or them, then my will and meaning is, that all and singular the premises herein lastly devised, shall go and remain to the survivor of them, and the heirs of his or her body lawfully to be begotten in manner aforesaid; and in failure of issue of either of their bodies lawfully begotten, then I give and bequeath the same premises to the use of the children of my brothers, Charles Morgan, and James Morgan, in manner following, that is to say, two third parts of the said premises unto the children of Charles Morgan, and one-third part thereof to the children of James Morgan, and their lawful issue, their heirs and assigns, for ever, share and share alike." The devise to the four grandchildren and their issue consists of two clauses or parts, the first giving estates to the four grandchildren for life, with remainder in tail to their sons and daughters. The language leaves no doubt as to the estates which are granted to the grandchildren being for life only, and the estates to their sons and daughters being to them as purchasers in tail. The second clause is in these terms:—"In case either of my said grandchildren, William, Samuel, Alice, and Hannah, shall happen to die, leaving no issue behind him, her, or them, then my will and meaning is, that all and singular the premises herein lastly devised shall go and remain to the survivor of them, and the heirs of his or her body lawfully to be begotten in manner aforesaid." For the defendant it was insisted that this last devise, being a devise in the events which have happened, "the survivor and heir of the body lawfully begotten" gave the survivor an estate tail; while for the plaintiff it was contended, that though the words that are contained afterwards, "his or her body," are found in this clause, which give an estate tail unconnected with anything taking their effect away, yet as they are found, in connexion with words going before and coming after them, to be mere words of reference to the preceding clause, giving an estate for life, with remainder to the sons and daughters, as purchasers, the effect of the words "shall go and remain to the survivor of them, and the heirs of his or her body lawfully to be begotten in manner aforesaid," is to bring the lands in the events to which the second clause applies within the preceding clause, which gives life estates to the grandchildren, with remainder in tail to the sons and daughters; and we think this is the true construction of the clause. Such construction, on an examination of the sense of the particular words used, is more consistent with the intention of the testator than that contended for by the defendant, and is supported by the authority of decided cases. The clause was probably intended to supply the deficiency, or remove the doubt arising in the first clause, as to the persons who should take, in the event of one or more of the grandchildren dying without leaving issue. The words with which it commences, "my will and meaning is," are explanatory of the supplemental clause; the words "in manner aforesaid," are necessarily connected by grammatical construction with the words "shall go and remain," and refer to something introductory to the words "to the survivor and the heirs of his or her body lawfully begotten." The words "in manner aforesaid," taken in this connexion, have an express reference to the sense of "going and remaining," in some before-mentioned clause, by which the estates would "go and remain to the grandchildren, and the heirs of his or her body lawfully begotten," and there is no such meaning of "going and remaining," in any preceding part of the will, except the first clause, which gives estates to the grandchildren for life, and remainder to their sons and daughters in tail, which, though not in words a devise to the heirs of the body or bodies of the sons and daughters, is a devise which may not improperly be described as to the heirs of the bodies of the sons and daughters, inasmuch as those who would take under that are the same persons, and would take in the same order and succession, and to the same extent of interest. The defendants' construction of the words "in manner aforesaid" is inappropriate, and would give to these words no effect and meaning; but the will would be the same as if these words were left out; whereas the construction of the plaintiffs gives to them due meaning and effect. "It is always desirable," says Lord Ellenborough in Meredith v. Meredith, 10 East, 510, in commenting on the words "as aforesaid," "if possible to give effect to all the words of a will, and particularly when it enables the Court to give a uniform and consistent sense to the whole will." It is also clear, we think, that the words "lawfully begotten," in the first clause, applied to the sons and daughters who take as purchasers, and not to the heirs who are described as "heirs of their bodies lawfully issuing," or only as heirs of their bodies, without the words "lawfully to be begotten," and throughout the will it will be found the words "lawfully to be begotten," which occur a great many times, are applied to the sons and daughters taking as purchasers, and not to heirs to the extent it is in the clause in question; and so, also, in the analogous clause in the devise of the Abergavenny estates to Alice and Hannah. With respect to the meaning of the testator, it is evident that that construction which gives an estate tail is repugnant to the meaning carefully expressed in the words of the first clause, and to the giving an estate tail in the whole to the only daughter, which immediately precedes the second clause, and inconsistent with the general plan of the testator, as shewn by the devise to his son Samuel, and then to his grandson Thomas. The devise to Samuel, and then to Thomas, the grandson, for life, is a life interest only. There are several decided cases that support the construction we have adopted, and none which we are aware of are opposed to it. In Lisle v. Gray, 2 Lev. 223, and 1 P. W. 90, "a covenant to stand seised, to the use of the covenantor's son E. for life, and after his decease to the use of the first son of the body of E. and the heirs male of the body of the first son, and in default of such issue, to the use of the second son of the body of E. and the heirs male of the body of the second son, and in default of such issue, to the use of the third son of the body of E. and the heirs male of the body of the third son, and in default of such issue, to the use of the fourth son of the body of E. and the heirs male of the body of the fourth son; and to all and every other the heirs male of the body of the said E. respectively and successively, and the heirs male of their bodies, according to their seniority of birth;" and it was held by the King's Bench and Exchequer Chamber, that E. took an estate for life only, notwithstanding the express limitation to the heirs male of his body. In Lowe v. Davies, 2 Lord Raymond, 1561, the testator devised to Benjamin Jevon, and his heirs lawfully to be begotten, that is to say, to his first, second, third, and every son and sons successively, lawfully to be begotten of the body of the said Benjamin; and the heirs of the body of such first, second, and third, and every other son and sons successively, lawfully issuing; and it was held, that Benjamin took an estate for life and not in tail, and the clause that followed the limitation to the heirs of the body of Benjamin was explanatory of which heirs of the body of Benjamin the devise meant; and in Meredith v. Meredith, 10 East, 503, the words "as aforesaid" were held to incorporate the words in the former clause. Two more of these cases were cited and not denied in the case of Jesson and Others v. Wright, 2 Bligh. 1, and they are explanatory, as we think, in the present case, of the rule stated by the Lord Chancellor in Jesson v. Wright, that the words "heirs of the body" will yield to a clear particular intent, that the estate should be only for life, and that that may be from the effect of super-added words, or any expressions shewing the particular intent of the testator; but that that must be clear, intelligible, and unequivocal. In the first case, the words "shall go and remain in manner aforesaid," import a clear and distinct reference to the first clause of the devise, which draws it down and incorporates it with the second, and the clause so incorporated would be intelligibly and unequivocally a particular intent, that the grandchildren taking under the second clause, shall, like those who take under the first, take an estate for life only. For this reason we are of opinion the judgment must be for the plaintiff.

COMMISSIONERS' COURTS.

Wednesday, July 1.

(Before Mr. Commissioner GOULBURN.)

Re W. MILLS.

The duty of traders, when they become embarrassed, is to come to this court on their own petition, and secure an equal division of their property among all their creditors. If they neglect to do this, or, being embarrassed, pay some in preference to others, they cannot claim the protection of this Court.

In the case of W. Mills (a glover in Foster-lane, City), which was argued on Saturday last, the Commissioner took time to consider the case before delivering judgment, as it involved many disputed facts. The learned Commissioner delivered an elaborate judgment, commenting very minutely upon the duty of traders when they became embarrassed, the object and benefit of the bankrupt laws, and the facts of the case, which are shortly these:—The bankrupt has been for a considerable time in trade, and in the panic of 1826 he was declared a bankrupt, and his estate under that bankruptcy had not as yet paid any dividend. He did not obtain his certificate under that commission for three or four years after passing his last examination. He embarked in trade again, and his first dealings were with Mr. Underwood, who is the largest creditor, and who had been in the house of his uncle (a Mr. Chamberlaine, a glover at Leicester) for upwards of thirty years. At that gentleman's decease he carried on the business, and as the bankrupt had dealt with Mr. Chamberlaine for a length of time, he (Mr. Underwood) was induced to give him credit, at various times, to the extent of about £201; and during the whole of his dealing with him (the bankrupt) he has never received one farthing from him. In January last Mills called his creditors together, when he offered a composition of 6s. 8d. in the pound. In April, 1846, he became a bankrupt upon his own petition, but before doing so he sold his stock at a great sacrifice, administered his estate in which way he pleased, and made preferences to his brother by paying him his debt in full, and some creditors from 10s. to 14s. in the pound, whilst he was offering others 6s. in the pound within a month, and 1s. 8d. after a certain time. After all this had been done he came to this court with very little assets to receive its benefit. He has been dealing to some extent in accommodation bills, and his debts are about 2,000l., to meet which he says he has, good debts, 5l. 5s.; furniture, &c. 100l.; and railway scrip, 100l., which has been sold by the official assignee under the fiat for 60l. The bankrupt said in his examination, "It was with the consent of the creditors that I paid my brother in full." Mr. Underwood did not accept the offer made by the bankrupt, and he gave his reasons for so doing. Mr. Commissioner Goulburn wished it to be publicly known, that when traders became in difficulties, they could come to this court upon their own petition, and have their estates fairly and equally divided amongst the creditors. Under all the circumstances of this case the Court must suspend the bankrupt's certificate for the space of two years. The object of the bankrupt law was two-fold; first, to obtain from the trader a full and true disclosure and discovery of his estate, with a view to its equal distribution by the Court amongst the creditors; and that being done, secondly, to give to the bankrupt so having disclosed all his estate and effects, ample indemnity for the past, and protection for the future. Now in this case the bankrupt sought the latter object alone, having altogether run counter to the first, and thereby he (the bankrupt) had left himself without a locus standi in this court, and therefore in justice ought to take nothing from it. However, I (continued the learned Commissioner), am only induced not to go to the extreme point of altogether withholding the certificate in this case by two or three considerations which have been pressed upon me by the advocate for the bankrupt. One in particular was, that at the time when this bankrupt first found himself in difficulties (November or December, 1845), the statute enabling traders to make themselves bankrupt had very recently passed, and its provisions had not become generally known, and probably were not so to this bankrupt. It appeared also in the earlier part of his conduct relative to his calling together his creditors, he had acted upon the advice of a very respectable solicitor, upon whom (though the Commissioners thought such advice was not the course the bankrupt ought to have taken under the circumstances), the bankrupt had good grounds for relying. There is another ground, viz. that in cases of this description, involving so deeply the future prospects of traders who failed, I am a single judge, sitting without the aid of a jury, and without any power of appeal from my decision. This ought to undergo revision by the Legislature. It is too great a weight of responsibility to throw upon any one mind the task of conclusively, and without the power of review, deciding upon the future fortunes and fate of a bankrupt trader. This consideration, I trust, will not make me shrink from performing a duty which I consider imperative, but it certainly makes me most anxious to keep clearly within, rather than exceed the limits of moderation, before I award against a bankrupt a judgment involving such penal consequences.

Suspended accordingly.

QUEEN'S BENCH.

May 30 and June 1 and 10.

REG. at the prosecution of ISAAC BUTT, Esq. Q.C. v. FREDERICK JACKSON, Gent. one of the Attorneys.

Privilege of counsel—Criminal information for sending a challenge to counsel for words used in addressing a jury for a prisoner.

The Court will, in certain cases, though making a rule absolute for a criminal information, impose at the same time upon the prosecutor the terms of not proceeding to file it without the further order of the Court.

In this case a conditional order was obtained on a former day (see 7 Law T. 237) for leave to file a criminal information against the defendant, one of the attorneys of the court, for provoking the prosecutor, who was one of her Majesty's counsel, to fight a duel with him. In the report of the proceedings on that occasion, the substance of the affidavit of the prosecutor, and the letters which passed between the parties, will be found, from which it will be seen that the transaction arose out of certain observations contained in a speech made by the prosecutor, as counsel for a Mrs. Scott, who had been indicted for bigamy, in which he animadverted very strongly upon the conduct of the defendant, who was the attorney for the prosecution.

The affidavit of the defendant denied most positively the charges made against him in the prosecutor's address to the jury, and stated that he had never made any improper proposition to Mrs. Scott, to induce her to make a dishonourable compromise with Mr. Scott, or had ever suggested to her that in case she supplied evidence which would enable Mr. Scott to procure a divorce, that she should be paid the sums mentioned by her in her answer in the Chancery cause pending between her and Mr. Scott. Defendant's affidavit further stated that Mr. Butt, in allusion to defendant's conduct in the management of the prosecution of Mrs. Scott, with reference to the following letter—

"Harcourt-street, July 29th, 1845.

"DEAR MADAM,—I wrote to Mr. Irwin on Saturday, stating the cause of some delay which arose, and proposing now to complete the arrangement; I dare say he has by this written to you, and I think you will approve of what I proposed. If you send me an account on foot of the alimony, I shall endeavour to get it forwarded to you. I do not know any thing of the 25l. retained by Mr. Irwin.

"I remain yours truly,

"FREDERICK JACKSON."

"To Mrs. Scott,

"Post-office, Ryde, Isle of Wight."

said, "That letter was written in July, 1845, and the circumstances were the same then as now; and he (meaning deponent) was preparing the prosecution then. Had he said he was draining the wells of London and the hotels of Derry, and looking for witnesses who would make their fortunes, that he sent a bellman throughout Ulster, he would have written the letter of an honest man." The affidavit further stated that Mr. Butt said, "If I had Mr. Jackson, whose house in Harcourt-street was an emporium for the concoction of perjury from the north, on that table, to get out the details of this prosecution, you would see perjury had done its work;" and that these observations were accompanied by most violent gestures towards deponent. The deponent, in his affidavit, in the fullest manner denied all these imputations, stating positively that he had never been in a gambling-house in his life, and had never, to his knowledge or belief, produced any witness at the said trial out of a hell in London, or from any other disreputable place, and that at the period of his writing the letter of the 29th of July, 1845, he had not, directly or indirectly, received any suggestion, instruction, or direction to institute proceedings against Mrs. Scott, or to make any inquiries on the subject; and that at that period he was not aware of the particulars of her character, or the exact circumstances of her marriage with John Bindon Scott; and that he believed that the jury gave credit to the witnesses produced for the prosecution, as to all the material facts stated by them, but that the evidence as to the religion of James Carter (to whom it was charged that Mrs. Scott had been married) was not conclusive on either side, and that the jury gave the prisoner the benefit of the doubt on that point, and acquitted her, and that Mr. Butt declined to examine deponent to explain the letter of the 29th of July, 1845, though asked so to do by counsel for the prosecution. Deponent further stated, that Mr. Snagg, one of Mrs. Scott's attorneys, had sent him a communication, through two gentlemen, Mr. Brereton and Mr. T. W. Bond, stating that he had not authorized Mr. Butt to make the attack on the deponent which he did, and that he (Snagg) also personally told deponent so, and that he knew nothing in his character to authorize such an attack; and that he gave Mr. Butt the letter of the 29th of July to read for two purposes only—to show that alimony was given to Mrs. Scott by the Consistorial Court, and that some offer was made for a compromise, of the nature of which he (Snagg) was ignorant, but that it was reasonable to throw out to the jury that she had refused it; that Mr. McGusty, Mr. Snagg's partner, had told him (deponent) that he knew nothing whatever of the attack made on him, as he did not take any active part in the proceedings. The defendant's affidavit detailed also several interviews between deponent and Mr. R. Murdock, a mutual friend, upon the subject of the observations made by Mr. Butt relative to the defendant, which passages it is unnecessary to set out, as they are fully detailed in the judgment of the Court. Several other affidavits were filed on behalf of the defendant, both to support the allegation of Mr. Snagg having disclaimed the language used by Mr. Butt, and for the purpose of negating the fact of any dishonourable compromise having been proposed to Mrs. Scott. There was also an affidavit of the gentleman who reported the speech in question, specifying the precise language applied by the prosecutor to the defendant.

The prosecutor filed a supplemental affidavit denying the accuracy of the report of his speech relied on by the defendant, but admitting that in his address to the jury, he had stated that Mr. Jackson's conduct was disgraceful to him as a man; and stating, with reference to his observations upon the defendant's letter of 29th July, that the following were nearly, if not identically, the expressions he made use of; and that this was the letter which he proposed to the jury as that which Mr. Jackson ought to have written:—"MADAM,—You are the vilest of women; I am framing an indictment against you, founded on your crimes; I am about to place you in a felon's dock, and if the oaths and consciences of twelve men do not protect you, I will place you in a felon's cell. I have raked up from the hells of London that man who pretends to be your husband. I have sent a bellman through Ulster to ring for the perjury of a province to bear you down, and I have opened at my office, in Harecourt-street, a receipt of slander, where no scandal is too contemptible, thankfully to be received, and (as deponent best recollected) munificently paid for."

Hatchell, Q.C. (with whom was Henn, Q.C.) now shewed cause, and contended the rule ought to be discharged on the grounds that the prosecutor had, in his affidavits, omitted to disclose to the Court material facts; and that from the affidavits it appeared that he had disintegrated himself to the extraordinary interference of the Court by the course he had adopted.

Bennet, Q.C. and Napier, Q.C. appeared in support of the rule.

JUDGMENT.

June 16.—BLACKBURN, C.J.—In this case of the Queen at the prosecution of Isaac Butt against Frederick Jackson, an application has been made by Mr. Butt, one of her Majesty's counsel, for leave to file a criminal bill against Mr. Jackson, who is an attorney of this court. The ground of the application is his having sent Mr. Butt two letters, one dated the 17th, and the other the 22nd of April, 1846, with the intention of provoking him to fight a duel; and also the publication of these and other letters in the newspapers of this city on the 23rd of April. That the tendency and intention of those letters were such as the prosecutor has imputed to them has not, indeed could not, be denied; and the duty of the Court would be as simple as it is imperative, if we had only to consider whether those letters could be made the subject of a criminal information; but the application is resisted by the defendant upon two grounds, and these have engaged the serious attention of the Court. The first ground is, that the prosecutor provoked him to send a hostile message; and the second is, that the prosecutor has not disclosed to the Court facts which it was his duty to have disclosed. The provocation alleged to have been given is the slander of the defendant's character in an address made by the prosecutor as counsel for Mrs. Scott, who was tried for bigamy at the Commission Court in the month of April last. In reply to this the prosecutor insists that all he said was warranted by his instructions as Mrs. Scott's counsel, and was spoken in the discharge of his professional duty. This is contradicted by the defendant, who contends that in the observations of which he complains the prosecutor exceeded his instructions, and that upon a review of the proceedings at the trial it appears that the imputations made against his character and conduct were not warranted by the facts of the case, and that they were therefore unjustifiable. On these grounds we are required by the prosecutor to decide that he had a right, as counsel for Mrs. Scott, to use the language of which the defendant complains, and on the other hand, the defendant requires us to decide that Mr. Butt had not a right to use such language. It is unquestionably true, as a general proposition, that a person appealing to the extraordinary jurisdiction of this court exposes his own conduct, in the transaction which he complains of, to examination and scrutiny, and the Court will inquire into the provocation which he may have given, and, as the result of that investigation, it may refuse to take the matter at his instance out of the ordinary course of the law. In doing so the Court does not decide that the law has not been violated. It merely leaves the violation to be dealt with by the ordinary tribunals. But the present is not one of those cases in which we have been particularly required to, and have acted upon such a rule, and have refused to grant a criminal information. In this case the prosecution arises from what the prosecutor, for the reasons which have been stated by him, insists was an act of duty, and done in the exercise of a right, which was essential to enable him to discharge that duty. Upon this point the parties are at issue, and require us to decide between them. This we cannot do; there is not, that I am aware of, any instance to be found in which the Court has been engaged in such an investigation as a preliminary to the exercising its authority to grant a criminal information. In fact we do not possess in this case, nor in any similar case, information or means of information upon which to act, and without the possession of which it would be rash, even if it were possible, to come to any conclusion. We cannot afford any remedy or any redress. To refuse to grant a criminal information in such a case would be neither. It would not protect Mr. Jackson, though ever so much aggrieved, from a criminal prosecution to which he is liable; and the danger of assuming such a power is obvious, for our opinion might not agree with that of the tribunal to which this case may yet be properly submitted. For these reasons, it appears to me impossible that the exercise of the right insisted upon by the prosecutor, or indeed of any other right can be drawn within our jurisdiction by a person who, having sent a message challenging the prosecutor to fight a duel, attempts to excuse himself by a denial of the right of the party of whom he complains. Many cases may be put illustrating the soundness of this opinion. Take, for example, a case where a prosecution of this nature may have arisen out of an alleged libel by the prosecutor on the defendant, which, on the other side, is insisted to be a privileged communication, how could this Court try that question? Can there be a doubt that the proper course would be to let the case go to trial, to let it be tried in an action, if the defendant should think proper to bring one, and that in the meantime the law should be vindicated, which we can do without the risk of injustice to any party? I admit that cases may arise in which the acts of a prosecutor, out of which the transaction originates, might be stated by him to be done in the exercise of a right, but which might appear to the Court to be merely a pretext. But, declining as we do to determine whether the prosecutor in this case was right or wrong in his address to the jury at the trial, we cannot look upon his address as having been without some colour of right or justification; and if it were for no other reason than this, that it was delivered in the presence of two of the Judges of the land, and that they do not seem to have thought that it was incumbent on them to interfere, nor did the defendant make any complaint or appeal to them for redress. In confirmation of the objection of the Court to decide this matter, which it appears both parties require us to do, I shall remark, further, that it would be highly inexpedient for us to take on ourselves, incidentally, and for any peculiar purpose, such as that which now presents itself, the decision of a question of so much importance, and one connected with the general administration of justice; such a question must be tried by itself, and on its own merits; it cannot be mixed up with the consideration of a transaction in which it is sought to make a man responsible otherwise than to the laws of his country for his conduct, whether as an officer or as an advocate, in a court of justice. It belongs to every subject of this realm, in all courts of justice, to assert and defend his rights, and to protect his liberty and his life, by the free and untrammelled statement of every fact, and use of every argument and observation, that can legitimately, that is, according to the rules and privileges of the law, conduce to those important ends. Every man has this right, and the privilege of exercising it in his own person. He may also commit its exercise to counsel, who takes it as his delegate; but its nature and constitution are not altered by that delegation. It is still the same right, to be exercised in the same manner and for the same purposes, and subject to the same limitation and control, as it would be if the party were pleading his own case. This consideration will at once shew the fallacy of the argument, that instructions to counsel are the test by which we should try whether the line of duty has been passed or not. No instructions can justify observations which are not warranted by facts proved, or by facts which may be legally proved; and it is the duty of counsel to exercise their own judgment and experience, and discretion; and whatever may be the nature of their instructions, to exclude all observations which the case does not properly admit of. Subject to these judicious and necessary limits, this right, when duly exercised, and directed to its proper purpose, should not be impeded or controlled; for if it be, an injury is sustained, not by the advocate, but by the client; not by the client alone, but by the entire community, whose interests are inseparably connected with a right which is essential to the administration of justice. Admitting that, in the exercise of this right, abuses have occurred, and may occur, they must be made matter of legal complaint and redress; they must not be redressed by a violation of the law of the land. Declining is a practice criminal in the highest degree, and those who provoke it are guilty of an offence of great magnitude. Happily the spirit of the age unites in its condemnation with the authority of the law and the solemn mandates of religion; and this Court must be, as it always has been, prompt and determined to discountenance and suppress this senseless relic of barbarity. It has become our duty to consider the omission of material facts which has been imputed to the prosecutor. These charges of omission are two—the first is, that the original affidavit makes no mention of those passages in Mr. Butt's address which impute to the defendant the subornation or concoction of perjury. To this the prosecutor replies, that the letter of the 17th April (see 7 Law T. p. 297, ante) pointed to and confirmed the complaint of the defendant to that part of the address which reflected on the defendant's conduct in making the proposition, whatever it was, alluded to in his letter to Mrs. Scott dated the 29th July, 1845; and he further states that he did not use the phrases imputed to him, nor any others, with the intention of charging the defendant with the concoction of perjury. Now, although I think the prosecutor has assigned a sufficient reason to excuse the omission with which he is charged in this particular, I cannot avoid expressing my deep regret that he should have used language of the character which he admits he did use, and which, if he did not intend to charge Mr. Jackson with the subornation of perjury, was unfortunately but too well calculated to make such an impression. The next objection relates to the omission of the matters which occurred between Mr. Jackson and Mr. Murdoch on Monday, the 20th of April; and it is necessary to examine very minutely the allegations made in the affidavits relative to this matter. The first affidavit of Mr. Butt details the delivery to him of the letter of the 17th April, and what occurred on Saturday the 16th April, when Mr. Butt declined to give any reply to the bearer of the letter, Captain Blackwood, and deferred his reply until another indictment then pending against Mrs. Scott was disposed of, and an appointment was made for Captain Blackwood to receive his answer at four o'clock on the following Monday, if the second trial should then be over, or if not, then as soon as it should be terminated. Mr. Butt's affidavit states that he consulted members of his own profession in the interval, who advised him that he was imperatively bound to decline giving an explanation in answer to the letter of Mr. Jackson; he then states that, Monday having arrived, Mrs. Scott was acquitted of the second indictment, and that on that day he saw Captain Blackwood in court, and followed him out, and appointed ten o'clock that evening for him to receive his answer. On that occasion Captain Blackwood said that, if any arrangement were suggested, he would not throw any obstacle in the way, and he shewed Mr. Butt a letter from Mr. Murdoch, written the day before, which letter, Mr. Butt said, that gentleman was not authorised by him to write, though he might have been authorised by Mr. Jackson, adding "You had better see Mr. Jackson on the subject." This is the order in which the transactions which had occurred up to that period are detailed by Mr. Butt; thence all that he has disclosed relative to Mr. Murdoch's interference; but it appears that a great deal occurred relative to this matter, of which he makes no mention whatever. It is absolutely necessary, in considering this part of the case, to state verbatim a part of Mr. Jackson's affidavit. Mr. Jackson states that the application to postpone the second indictment against Mrs. Scott was fixed for Monday, at two o'clock; "that early on the said day, and previous to this, deponent going to said Commission Court, deponent met Robert Murdoch, seq. one of the attorneys of this honourable Court, and on whose honourable character this deponent has the utmost reliance, and whom deponent believes to be a friend and well-wisher of this deponent, and whom deponent knew to be on the most intimate terms with the said Isaac Butt; and said Robert Murdoch introduced the subject of said speech so made by said Isaac Butt, and stated his regret that any observation harmful to deponent's feelings should have been made; and stated that he, the said Robert Murdoch, was certain the same had been used by said Isaac Butt in the heat and excitement of said speech, and expressed a wish that an explanation should take place on the subject, and stated that he would wish to speak to deponent again on the subject; said, that, in the afternoon of said day, this deponent was attending said court in Green-street, waiting for the calling on of the application to postpone the said second indictment, when said Robert Murdoch called this deponent out of court and requested deponent to walk with said Robert Murdoch in Green-street, and that he, Robert Murdoch, there informed deponent that he had been speaking to Isaac Butt on the subject, and then added that he considered a statement satisfactory to deponent's feelings would be made at the rising of the Court on that day; but that said Isaac Butt felt a difficulty in doing so in consequence of deponent's letter as delivered to him on the 16th day of April as aforesaid; and said Robert Murdoch then said to deponent, "As a personal favour, and a friend to you both, let that letter be considered withdrawn, or otherwise say that that Butt wishes to say would appear under menace;" and in consequence of the terms of friendship and intimacy which existed between said Robert Murdoch and said Isaac Butt, and also of his friendship with this deponent, this deponent felt, and still feels, that said Robert Murdoch was desirous of acting in a kind manner as well to deponent as to the said Isaac Butt, and accordingly deponent consented that said Robert Murdoch should inform said Isaac Butt that he might consider said letter withdrawn, which the said Robert Murdoch subsequently on that day informed deponent, and which deponent believes to be true; that said Robert Murdoch accordingly, immediately after deponent as aforesaid, communicated the same to the said Isaac Butt; and deponent expected that, at the rising of the Court on said day, such statement would have taken place; and deponent sent for said Richard Blackwood, and informed him of what had occurred; said that the said Court rose without any explanation being offered, and deponent was in consequence apprehensive that some misapprehension existed in the mind of said Robert Murdock, and therefore at once proceeded to his office in College-green, Dublin, and informed him that no explanation had taken place; and that deponent, having placed himself in the hands of said Richard Blackwood as his friend, felt considerably embarrassed, especially as said Rich. Blackwood informed deponent he had an appointment that afternoon with said Isaac Butt. But said Robt. Murdock expressed his conviction that said statement had not been made by reason of the said second indictment not having been called on, and that same would be made next day. And in order to prevent deponent from in any manner being embarrassed by his interference, stated he would write, and accordingly did write the letter referred to in the affidavit of said Isaac Butt, as an authority for deponent to authorize said Richard Blackwood postponing his visit upon that day, which this deponent handed to said Richard Blackwood, and which letter of the said Robert Murdock is in the words and agrees following:—

“ 21, College-Green, Monday Evening.

“ Dear Sir,—Understanding you left a letter at Mr. Butt's, and that you purpose calling there at four o'clock this evening, I feel authorized, as the friend of the parties, to request your not doing so for the present till you hear further. Yours very truly,

It would from this appear, upon an attentive perusal of the affidavits, that four interviews took place between Mr. Murdock and Jackson on that Monday morning. In the first Murdock spoke himself, and without any communication with Mr. Butt. But it would appear, and indeed there can be no doubt, that before the second interview, and in the mean time, he had seen Mr. Butt. Then, when speaking to the defendant, he stated to him that he expected that a communication which would be satisfactory to his feelings would be made at the rising of the Court, but that Butt felt a difficulty in consequence of the letter delivered to him. So here was a mutual friend treating and communicating with both parties, stating the impediment, and the only one, that Mr. Butt felt to giving what Murdock conceived would be a satisfactory explanation to the defendant; and Murdock in this interview said, “ Let the letter of the 17th April be withdrawn, as otherwise any thing Butt says may be considered as done under menace.” It is plain that the prosecutor had felt and suggested this difficulty. Mr. Murdock says so; and it is fairly to be inferred that Jackson was induced to believe, and expected, that an explanation would follow; he, in consequence, told Mr. Murdock to tell Mr. Butt the letter might be considered as withdrawn; and in a subsequent interview between Murdock and the prosecutor, the latter is informed on that same Monday that the letter is withdrawn, and the defendant remains under the expectation that the explanation promised by Murdock, and for which he seems to have had the authority of the prosecutor, would have been given at the rising of the Court; I say the authority of Mr. Butt, who raised the difficulty which Mr. Murdock represented to flow from the letter of the 17th of April. It may be said that all which Murdock stated is assumed to be true. I do assume it to be so, and so have both the parties, and I am safe in so assuming, because in the prosecutor's supplemental affidavit the accuracy of the statement is not denied, and there is only a simple denial of Murdock's authority to write the letter to Captain Blackwood requiring him to delay calling at the prosecutor's at the time originally fixed. No explanation takes place, and Mr. Butt in his affidavit does not say what he stated or what he did when informed by Mr. Murdock that the letter of defendant was withdrawn. No reply is given to Mr. Jackson, who is left in ignorance of the intentions of the prosecutor, and who only knows that the promised explanation has not been given. The next day Mr. Butt sees Captain Blackwood in court, and calling him aside appoints eight o'clock the same evening to give a reply to the communication of which he had been previously the bearer. It is impossible to doubt that the prosecutor should have given some account and explanation of the transactions which occurred on the Monday, and of the part he took in them; and the omission is the more remarkable and open to objection, because he made a supplemental affidavit to Mr. Jackson's, who relied on those transactions. Had the case stood as it was at the close of Monday, I should doubt extremely that Mr. Butt could have been assisted by this Court. I think there was an omission (assuming it were to be only an error of judgment) which was not just to either his adversary or the Court, but still I am satisfied that it ought not to prevent us from interfering, and what took place on the Monday cannot palliate the subsequent conduct of the defendant, and for these reasons. When the treaty already mentioned for giving a satisfactory explanation to the defendant, and for the withdrawal of the letter of the 17th of April by Mr. Jackson had taken place, he should have terminated the authority of Capt. Blackwood, the retraction of it should have been immediate and unequivocal, and there the matter should have terminated. He ought, by that circumstance, to have been awakened to a sense of the position he held; particularly when, on the following evening, the challenge was declined, and most properly and laudably declined, by Mr. Butt. But instead of this, he appears to have added to his former breach of duty, and made it more flagrant, for it is impossible not to reprobate strongly the letter of the 22nd of April, and the publication of the correspondence in the newspapers on the 23rd. To judge from Mr. Jackson's subsequent conduct, it was not his intention absolutely to retract his letter; he never put himself in a position to shew he was resolved to retract it, and it is impossible to give him credit for having absolutely relinquished his intention to demand satisfaction by means of his friend Capt. Blackwood. He would have had great reason to complain if, having withdrawn his first letter, that satisfaction should have been refused him which he was led to expect; but it is not with merely the persisting in his original design that Jackson stands charged. He has to answer for other distinct and substantive offenses. Mr. Butt's refusal to meet him placed him in a position in which he should have recollected himself, having been very much in the wrong originally. Having dwelt upon the transactions of Monday, I must add, that I cannot connect them so as to make me think it possible that they were of such a nature as to preclude the right of the prosecutor to complain of what subsequently took place. My opinion is, that although the Court might be greatly embarrassed if called upon to decide upon the state of things in the earlier stages of the proceeding, yet that the treaty of Monday ceased to have the same degree of importance by reason of subsequent events. Having intimated an intention, as an act of public justice, to make the order absolute; it is due to Mr. Jackson to state it as an opinion that there is not the slightest stain resting on his character in respect to his conduct of the prosecution of Mrs. Scott; and although it does not therefore follow that Mr. Butt's address was unjustifiable, we are forced to conclude and believe that the indulgence of such extreme language as the prosecutor made use of was well calculated to do a great and unmerited injury to Mr. Jackson. Having a due regard to this, and keeping in mind the obscurity in which the prosecutor allowed us to remain as to part of the transactions of Monday, and also keeping in mind that, although not investigated, the complaint of Mr. Jackson against Mr. Butt may have been just and well founded, our rule is, that the conditional order be made absolute, but that no further proceedings be taken without the further order of the Court. For an order of this kind, the research of my brother Crampton has been enabled to supply a precedent in the proceedings in the case of Sturgeon v. Barlow, decided in the year 1894.

Napier, Q.C. stated that he had been instructed, on the part of the prosecutor, to express his consent that the conditional order should be discharged without costs at either side. The reason that proposition had not been previously made was, that Mr. Butt having been obliged to bring the matter under the consideration of the Court, he thought it but fair to the defendant not to cut short a public discussion, but to give him the opportunity of having the matter fully discussed by his able counsel, to give him the benefit of the full and fair discussion which had been had; but the Lord Chief Justice having now pronounced the well-considered judgment of the Court, he was instructed to state that, although Mr. Butt believed that in the discharge of his duty he had acted correctly, yet that, on the cooler consideration of all the circumstances of the case, he did feel that a serious injury had been inflicted upon Mr. Jackson, and he deeply regretted having been made the unconscious instrument of conveying imputations against him. Mr. Butt entertained no personal feelings against the defendant, his sole object was the vindication of the law; and having given Mr. Jackson the fullest opportunity of clearing his character, Mr. Butt now expressed, through his counsel, his sincere regret for any injury which Mr. Jackson might have sustained; and the prosecutor, therefore, now, on his own part, sought that the conditional order should be discharged without costs.

BLACKBURN, C.J. (after conferring with the rest of the Court).—Nothing can be more honourable to Mr. Butt than the proposition which he has now made; the opinion which he has formed of the purity of Mr. Jackson's conduct entirely concurs with that which is entertained by the Court. The only question now is, shall the order be discharged, or the rule left as pronounced by the Court? The Court propose to let it remain pronounced, Mr. Butt having distinctly intimated that he will not apply for the further order of the Court.

THE LEGISLATOR.

Summary.

ANOTHER stagnant week. The brief results of the labours of the Session so far are contained in the New Statutes that will be found in the present number and next week. This will be the smallest volume of statutes that any year has produced for half a century. So much the better, perhaps. A little rest will not be unwelcome to the Lawyers, after the labour annually imposed upon them of studying a thousand pages of new laws.

NEW STATUTES

CAP. XXII.

An Act to amend the Laws relating to the Importation of Corn. (June 26, 1846.)

This is the famous Corn Bill. It has no professional interest.

CAP. XXIII.

An Act to alter certain Duties of Customs. (June 26, 1846.)

CAP. XXIV.

An Act for removing some defects in the Administration of Criminal Justice. (June 26, 1846.)

We present this Act entire.

1. Power of criminal courts as to terms of transportation and imprisonment.—Whereas in certain cases of felony the Court is not empowered by law to award sentence of transportation for a less period than the term of the offender's life or some long term of years, or sentence of imprisonment for any shorter term than two years; but it is desirable that some such offenders should suffer transportation or imprisonment for a shorter period respectively, at the discretion of the Court before which they are convicted: now be it enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that in all cases where the Court is now by law empowered or required to award a sentence of transportation exceeding seven years, it shall be lawful for such Court, at its discretion, to award a sentence of transportation for a term of years not less than seven years, or to award such sentence of imprisonment for any period not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, as shall to the Court in its discretion appear just under all the circumstances.

2. Repeal of provision in 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 36, as to indictments before grand jury of Central Criminal Court. Indictments may now be preferred before the said Court.—And whereas it is now required by law that no indictment shall be presented before the grand jury of the Central Criminal Court for certain offences unless the party prosecuting shall have first entered into recognizances to prosecute; be it enacted, that the said provision be and the same is hereby repealed; and that bills of indictment may be preferred by any person before the grand jury of the said Court for any offence alleged to be committed within the jurisdiction of the said Court in the same manner as may be done before any other grand jury.

3. Writs for removing indictments from Central Criminal Court to specify county, &c. in which same shall be tried.—And whereas doubts have been raised as to the proper place of trial, where indictments have been removed by writ of certiorari from the Central Criminal Court into the Court of Queen's Bench; be it enacted, that every writ of certiorari for removing an indictment from the said Central Criminal Court shall specify the county or jurisdiction in which the same shall be tried; and a jury shall be summoned and the trial proceed in the same manner in all respects as if the indictment had been originally preferred in that county or jurisdiction.

4. Certificate of recognizance filed to prosecute writ of error, to be made out by the Clerk of the Crown, Master or Assistant Master on the Crown side of the Court of Queen's Bench, and to be a sufficient warrant for defendant's discharge.—And whereas, by an Act passed in the last session of Parliament, intitled "An Act to stay Execution of Judgment for Misdemeanors upon giving Bail in Error," it is (amongst other things) enacted, that the Clerk of the Crown in the Court of Queen's Bench shall, for the purposes in the said Act mentioned, make out and deliver certificates in writing under his hand of the due filing of record in the said court of any recognizance given to prosecute any writ of error in the manner in the said Act mentioned, and that any such certificate, when duly verified by affidavit, shall be a sufficient warrant to every gaoler or other person having the custody of such defendant or defendants in execution of such judgment to discharge him or them out of custody, and also to every person having in his possession the whole or any part of any fine levied in execution of any such judgment, to authorize and require the repayment thereof to the defendant or defendants: and whereas the making of such affidavit creates unnecessary expense and delay, and it is expedient to dispense with the same, and to make further provision for the making and delivery of such certificates; be it therefore enacted, That any such certificate as aforesaid under the hand either of the said Clerk of the Crown or of the Master or Assistant Master on the Crown side of the said Court, and sealed with the seal of the Crown Office in the said Court, shall be a sufficient warrant for the discharge of any such defendant or defendants, and for the repayment of any such fine.

THE MAGISTRATE.

Summary.

THE great questions of the prevention of crime and the regulation of punishment; how a man may best be deterred from getting into gaol, and how saved from utter ruin when he gets out of it, are to be the social reforms which are the peculiar mission of the new Government. The addresses of most of the ministers allude to these problems, as requiring speedy solution; and when the extent of an evil is fully understood, it is not so difficult to find a remedy. We presume that the Poor Removal Bill will perish with its parents, and be no more heard of, during this Session at least. In the next it will probably re-appear in a different dress; another, yet the same.

FORM OF EXAMINATIONS.

Two cases decided during the last term are of such great practical importance that we must direct special attention to them. They relate to the form of caption and jurat in examinations.

The first was that of Reg. v. The Inhabitants of Molesworth, which was by some accident omitted by the reporters of the LAW TIMES, but which appears in the New Sessions Cases. In this case three questions were raised: 1st. Whether an order expressed to be on a complaint made "by Thomas George, on behalf of the churchwardens and overseers," was not bad for not shewing the authority of Thomas George to make such complaint for them? 2nd. Whether the certificate of chargeability rendered unnecessary any evidence on oath that the pauper was resident? 3rd. If the caption of the examinations should not shew that they and each of them had been taken on the complaint of the churchwardens and overseers? The Court held, as to the last point, that the caption of an examination ought to shew that it was so taken. In practice this is so rarely done that, according to the above decision, very few orders could be supported, and therefore the utmost care should be taken in future, not merely to state the fact of the complaint in the caption, but to do so in terms which shall afford no opportunity for further quibbling. The Courts are evidently inclining to strictness in all matters of form relating to removals, and however absurd such objections may be in reason, they are law, and must be observed.

The other case is that of Reg. v. Ratcliffe Caley, reported 7 LAW T. 182. Here the first of the examinations correctly set out the caption, and shewed that it was taken before justices having jurisdiction. But the second and subsequent examinations were headed, "touching the above-named settlement, taken upon oath before us, the said justices," and contained no other allegation by which the jurisdiction of the justices was shewn. The Court of Queen's Bench held the order to be bad, expressly asserting the rule that each examination should be a complete and perfect document in itself. Mr. Justice WILLIAMS used these expressions: "The statute says, copies of the examinations shall be sent. What is this, when the examination can only be made good by a reference to the next preceding or one further removed?"

With all deference to the learned judge, there is an error in this. The statutes say a copy of the examination (not copies of the examinations, in the plural) shall be sent. Now this seems to us to constitute a very important distinction, to which the attention of the Court does not appear to have been drawn. The statute has treated all the examinations as one document, and if so, a general caption and a general jurat should be sufficient. "The cases," says WILLIAMS, J. "as to the margin of an order or an indictment have nothing to do with this, for there the margin is part of the same document." But the real question yet to be determined is, whether the whole of the examinations do not, under the language of the statute, constitute together one document; to wit, the examination required by the statute to be sent.

This, however, is a point which may be better raised upon some past order; as the rule is an easy one to follow, that each examination shall be "a complete and perfect document in itself," it will be observed in future by all who desire to keep on the safe side.

At a recent sessions the question has arisen whether a common caption and jurat to several examinations, references being had to both of the former, to each of the latter will be sufficient. Arguing from analogy, in the instance of affidavits where the practice is of daily occurrence, it may be supposed that such a form would be sufficient; but the language of the judges in the case to which attention has been invited, here throws sufficient doubt upon the practice to make it prudent not to continue it longer.

It is therefore recommended to practitioners in future to give to each examination a distinct caption and jurat as complete and perfect as if it was the only one.

F. W. C.

THE NEW CHIEF JUSTICE OF THE COMMON PLEAS.—The following address of Sir T. Wilde, on bidding adieu to his constituents at Worcester, is a part of the legal history of the time:—Sir Thomas Wilde returned thanks. If I could want any motive to the pure and honest discharge of the solemn duties which are likely soon to devolve upon me, I should have it in the feeling that the citizens of Worcester will ever look upon me as their late representative with a watchful eye, in hopes that the honour of the city will be maintained in the integrity upon the bench of their former member. I ascend that bench under somewhat peculiar circumstances; I am about to occupy the seat of a man whom I have revered and loved, and that man, a few hours ago, was alive. How soon I may be called to another scene no one can tell. The suddenness of the occasion that has withdrawn me from you, ought to take me to that bench which I am about to ascend with the feelings of deep responsibility, which should be entertained, indeed, by every one charged with the welfare of his fellow-creatures, and uncertain how soon he is to answer for the manner in which he has fulfilled that duty. I leave you therefore with this security for my conduct; I value the friendship of many of the gentlemen around me, and I trust, that though my political connection with you has ceased, my connection with you as a friend will never cease but with my life. I feel that you have acquired an interest in my character and my conduct; I trust I have regard enough for you to take care that no member of the constituency of Worcester may ever blush for that magistrate who formerly represented him. I cannot doubt that the approbation of a city like Worcester must have had its share in inducing in the Government that confidence which has led them to advise her Majesty to confer upon me the high office I am now called to fill; I therefore feel that I owe you the allegiance of faithful and upright conduct. God send I may discharge it! To you I engage for my fidelity in that discharge of my duty which I trust will secure the approbation of my God when I shall be called hence by Him.

MUNICIPAL BOROUGH.—An abstract of the annual accounts of the municipal boroughs in England and Wales, presented to Parliament for the year ended the 31st of August last, has been printed in a document of forty-nine folio pages. There are 183 municipal boroughs in England and Wales, and in the document now before the House of Commons an abstract is given of the various accounts required in accordance with the 6th and 7th Wm. 4, cap. 104, and the 1st Vict. cap. 78. In the borough of Birmingham, it appears that the balance in the treasurer's hands at the end of last year was 4,901l. 17s. 7d.; the rents received in the year ended in August last amounted to 106l. 5s.; the borough rates to 29,315l. 14s. 6d.; from the treasury 846l. 10s. 11d. was received on account of prosecutions; the fines on convictions were 181l. 13s. 3d.; the sale of property, 198l. 5s. 6d.; which, with miscellaneous, 33l. 0s. 6d. made the receipts 35,583l. 7s. 3d. The expenditure is given on the other side of the account,—1,117l. for salaries and allowances; 365l. 8s. 0d. for rent, taxes, &c.; the pay of the police and constables in the year was 14,905l. 10s. 9d.; the administration of justice, prosecutions, &c. amounted to 1,803l. 19s. 6d.; the gaol maintenance, &c. of prisoners, 278l. 10s.; county expenses, 3,080l.; the coroner was paid 998l. 10s.; public works, repairs, &c. 200l. 15s.; municipal election, 68l. 3s.; printing, advertising, stationery, &c. 480l. 16s. 4d.; law expenses, 500l. Principal paid off, with interest, 1,393l. 18s. 8d.; and miscellaneous, 364l. 18s. 10d.; leaving a balance in the treasurer's hands of 10,025l. 17s. 1d. In the statement for Gravesend, 497l. 16s. 8d. appears to have been received in the year for tolls and dues; and at Great Yarmouth the tolls and dues were 4,111l. 11s. 1d.; and at Hull they were 8,284l. 4s. 9d.; whilst at Liverpool they were as much as 83,518l. 18s. 2d. In the borough of Liverpool, the receipts in the year, with a balance of 68,739l. 7s. 4d. in the treasurer's hands, were 646,112l. 12s. 8d.; of which 289,529l. 11s. 2d. was received on fines on grant and renewal of leases; and 4,345l. 4s. 11d. by fines on convictions. After various payments in the year, including 2,135l. 8s. 1d. given to charities, the balance in hand was, in August last, nearly 60,000l.

REMOVAL OF PAUPERS.—The House of Commons have directed the publication of a return, shewing the number of paupers removed to their places of settlement from the manufacturing towns of Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Cheshire, during the years 1841, 1842, and 1843. The total numbers of persons removed from 25 manufacturing towns enumerated in the return were—in 1841, 718 families, comprising 2,254 persons; in 1842, 1,393 families, comprising 3,922 persons; and in 1843, 1,745 families, comprising 5,166 persons. No returns had been received from Stockport, Bury, Blackburn, and Leeds (township). The return states that from Manchester there were removed, in 1842, 414 families, comprising 928 persons; in 1843, 587 families, comprising 1,553 persons. From Salford (including Pendlebury and Pendleton), in 1841, 156 families, comprising 419 persons; in 1842, 183 families, comprising 470 persons; in 1843, 229 families, comprising 614 persons. From Chorlton-upon-Medlock (including Ardwick and Hulme), in 1841, 32 families, comprising 90 persons; in 1842, 65 families, comprising 166 persons; in 1843, 66 families, comprising 186 persons.—Manchester Guardian.

POOR LAW GUARDIANS.—In a Parliamentary paper lately issued, two instances are given relative to the liabilities of poor law guardians acting as contractors, which instances may be of service as affording proof that indirect means are as opposed as direct means in the supply of articles to parishes. In the year 1840 the clerk of the Charterfield union discovered that an individual guardian was in the habit of supplying the contractor with part of the milk consumed in workhouses, which conduct in his opinion rendered him liable to the penalties imposed by the Act 65 Geo. 3, c. 137. The guardian kept a considerable number of cows and sold milk. His plea was that he was not bound to know that the milk he sold to the contractor was supplied to the parish. The secretary to the Poor Law Commissioners informed the clerk that the guardian was liable to the penalties prescribed, and cited the case West and Andrews, in 5th B. and A. page 398. In 1844 the keeper of a lunatic asylum applied to the commissioners to know whether the fact of having lunatic paupers in his asylum, for which he was paid quarterly by a union, prevented him from being a guardian of such union. The answer was, that if he was elected a guardian, and continued be concerned in the maintenance of the lunatics, he was liable to the penalties.

THE CONFESSION OF TAWELL, THE MURDERER, became the subject of another discussion amongst the magistrates of Bucks at their meeting on Thursday. The chaplain still refusing to give up the document, Dr. Lee gave notice that he would move the following resolution at the next Quarter Session:—"That the clerk be instructed to communicate to Mr. Cox the disapprobation of the magistrates with his conduct respecting the statement delivered by Mr. Tawell to Mr. Sherriff, the gaoler, and by Mr. Sherriff to the Rev. Mr. Cox, the chaplain of the gaol; that the magistrates fully expected that the Rev. Mr. Cox would have delivered up this statement to them in consequence of the request or desire to this effect, when made by a majority of the magistrates present at the Court of Quarter Sessions; and that they consider his conduct, in still withholding the document, has been uncourteous and even contumacious towards them."

The first prison in England adapted for the reception of prisoners before trial is in course of erection in Middlesex. It is called a "House of Detention."

THE LAWYER.

SUMMARY.

THIS has been a busy week among the Lawyers. No sooner were the legal appointments made by the new Ministry than they were disturbed by the sudden interposition of a higher power. It pleased the Almighty to call away, as it were, from the very judgment-seat he had filled with so much honour to himself and advantage to his country, Sir NICHOLAS TINDAL, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. The dignity was, according to usage, immediately offered to and accepted by Sir THOMAS WILDE, the Attorney-General of two days' standing. Of the deceased judge we have spoken elsewhere. Of his successor it may be said that a fitter man for the place could not be found. We have observed Sir THOMAS WILDE when occasionally sitting in aid of the judges during a heavy assize on the Western Circuit, and we remember our impression was that we had never seen a judge who played the part so well. His summings-up were masterly, and his addresses to the prisoners impressive beyond measure. The Common Pleas has sustained a great loss in Sir N. TINDAL; but the reputation of that Court, which has lately stood the highest in the esteem of the Profession, will not suffer by the exchange. Sir T. WILDE is a consummate lawyer, and brings to the judgment-seat that which is even more valuable than legal lore, an extensive acquaintance with men and the business of men, in which he has had a longer and larger experience than any lawyer of his age. By this unexpected exaltation Mr. JERVIS takes the high post of Attorney-General, thus within three days passing from a plain Q.C. to be Solicitor-General and Attorney-General; a rise whose rapidity is probably without precedent. It is said at the time we write, but not positively known, that Mr. ROMILLY will be the Solicitor-General, and it is known to be the Lord Chancellor's opinion that one of the Law Officers of the Crown ought to be taken from the Equity Bar.

The new Lord Chancellor has vigorously resumed his duties. He gives judgments with a rapidity to which the Court has been long a stranger. His wonderful mastery of Equity Law and Practice enables him to do this. His learning has not grown rusty during the period that it has been unused.

The Railways Dissolution Bill has become law, and is now in operation. We are surprised to see so few notices of intention to take advantage of its useful provisions for the amicable and inexpensive dissolution of abandoned railway schemes, and so to avoid the litigation now bringing ruin upon all parties.

JUDICIAL APPOINTMENTS IN IRELAND.

Chief Baron Brady, whose admirable conduct as a judge has won for him the unqualified approbation of all parties, has received an official announcement of his appointment as Lord Chancellor of Ireland. This selection will give universal satisfaction.

Mr. Pigot, the former Whig Attorney-General, is to be the new Chief Baron of the Exchequer, a station for which he is eminently qualified.

Mr. Greene, who acts as Attorney-General, waited upon Mr. Serjeant Stock, the late member for Cashel, with an intimation that he had been selected as judge of assize, in consequence of the acceptance of the office of Lord Chancellor by Chief Baron Brady. Mr. Stock, who is first sergeant, left town for Ennis, accompanied by Mr. Edwin Battersby as his regester, to attend the Munster circuit.

One of the Dublin papers, opposed to the Government, gives the following account of the new law officers:—

"Chief Baron of the Exchequer.—Mr. Pigot is appointed.

"Attorney-General, Mr. Richard Moore.—Is a great lawyer, and, what is more and better, he is a great man. Possessing a mind of no ordinary mould, and talents of no common calibre, he is a reasoner of the first order,—clear, concise, and logical, and possesses considerable powers as an orator. Mr. Moore is an honour to his profession, and his acceptance of office reflects more credit on the Government than their nomination does upon him. In private life, or in the circle in which he moves, no man is held in higher or more deserved estimation than Mr. Moore, and amongst the members of his own profession he is respected and beloved. It is scarcely necessary for us to say that Mr. Moore is an anti-Repealer. Those who know him state that he is a man of great firmness of purpose, and that, should the peace of the country be threatened, or its security be put in jeopardy, he is not to be deterred or cajoled from the discharge of his duty.

UNDER SECRETARY FOR IRELAND.—It is stated that Mr. Redington, Q. C. is to be the new under secretary, and, of course, he is to vacate the representation of Dundalk.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL.—Mr. Monahan is appointed to this important office. He is a Roman Catholic; but that per se, as we have over and over again asserted, is amongst the party we represent no objection, even with a Conservative Government in power, to the honourable promotion of any loyal and respectable professor of that creed. We cannot call to mind any occasion upon which Mr. Monahan appeared as a political character. He is a decided opponent to repeal; and the immense practice he has at the Bar is evidence—and the best that can be adduced—of the estimation in which he is held by the suitors, the solicitors, and the public.

IRISH LAW APPOINTMENTS—THE CIRCUITS.

Chief Baron Brady was to have gone the Connaught circuit as one of the judges of assize; but his elevation to the Chancellorship rendered it necessary to fill his place on circuit.

Mr. Justice Ball, who had been nominated to the Leinster circuit, left town for Rosecommon, to take the place of the late Chief Baron.

Baron Lefroy, the senior judge on the Munster circuit, will take the place of Mr. Justice Ball on the Leinster circuit.

Mr. Serjeant Stock, has been appointed one of the judges of assize on the Munster circuit, in the place of Baron Lefroy.

In consequence of the necessity of Mr. Pigot's attendance in the House of Commons during the progress of Bills relating to this country, the patent of the right hon. gentleman as Chief Baron will not be completed for some time; but no possible inconvenience can result from the delay, as the Court will not resume its sittings until Michaelmas Term.

NEWFOUNDLAND.—GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS.—His Excellency the Governor has been pleased to appoint Charles Simms, esq. to be Master in Chancery of the Supreme Court of this island, in room of the Hon. Assistant Judge Lilly; Mr. Martin Shea, of Placentia, to be a notary public in the southern district of this island; and Mr. Francis Lynch, to be a member of the Catholic Board of Education at Harbour Grace, in the room of Mr. Thomas Power, resigned.

COURT PAPERS.

CHANCERY ORDER.—The following order relative to keeping and examining accounts of the property in the Court of Chancery has just been issued by command of the Lord Chancellor, viz.:—In the matter of the Suitors of the High Court of Chancery. Whereas it is proper that the accounts kept by the Accountant-General of this Court should be examined and compared in order to settle the same:—And whereas it will require considerable time to perfect such examination, and it is necessary that a time should be appointed for closing the books of accounts of the said Accountant-General for the purpose aforesaid: his lordship doth order that the books of the said Accountant-General be closed from and after Saturday, the 15th day of August next, to Thursday, the 29th day of October next, in order to adjust the accounts of the suitors with the books kept at the Bank, and that during that time no draft for any money, or certificate for any effects under the care and direction of this Court, be signed or delivered out by the said Accountant-General, or any clerks or agents.

ties transferred or accepted by him relating to the suitors of this Court; and that no purchase, sale, or transfer be made by the said Accountant-General unless the order, request, or registrar's certificate be left at his office on or before Friday, the 7th day of August next; and that no order for the payment of any money out of court which may be then in court be received at the Accountant-General's office after Monday, the 10th day of August next; and, to the end that the suitors may have notice hereof, and apply to the Court as there shall be occasion to have money paid to them out of the Bank, or stocks or annuities transferred to them before the said 15th day of August next, it is ordered that this order be affixed up in the several offices of this court.

LEGAL INTELLIGENCE.

SURREY QUARTER SESSIONS.

Guildford, July 3.

The Joint-Stock Company Registration Act. Important Decision.

SAMUEL HENRY POWELL, Appellant, v. A CONVICTION BY THE HON. MR. NORTON.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Norton, at the Lambeth Police Court, convicting the appellant in the sum of 20l. for neglecting to register a railway speculation of which he had been the promoter.

W. Payne appeared in support of the conviction. Wallinger and Bagley were for the appellant.

Payne having taken some objections to the nature of the appeal, which were overruled by the Court, Wallinger addressed the bench on behalf of the appellant. He said this was an appeal against a conviction under the Act of the 7th and 8th Victoria, commonly known as the Joint Stock Company Registration Act. The appellant was alleged to have been the promoter of a railway undertaking called the Grand Junction Great Western and South Western Junction Railway Company; and a penalty of 20l. had been inflicted upon him for not having registered the company in accordance with the provisions of the above Act of Parliament. He should contend that such an association did not come within the scope and meaning of that Act of Parliament; and he referred the Court to the second clause in that Act, which required that certain undertakings should be registered, but which expressly excepted all undertakings from the operation of the Act where they could not be carried into effect without the sanction of an Act of Parliament. Now, as it was perfectly clear that the undertaking in question could not be carried into effect without an Act of Parliament, he submitted that the clause imposing the penalty could not apply to the case, and that, therefore, the conviction must be quashed. The learned counsel then cited the decision given by Lord Denman in a recent case of Lorton v. Hickman, which, he said, entirely confirmed the view of the Act he begged to suggest to the bench, and he therefore called upon the magistrates to quash the conviction.

Bagley, on the same side, said it appeared to him the point was so clear that he should not trouble the Court further than to say that in another decision in the Court of Exchequer, in the case of Smith v. Young, the very same principle had been sanctioned by the Court.

Payne said there were cases in which the legality of the sale of scrip was the question at issue, and they did not apply to this case.

Wallinger said the point involved in these cases was, whether railways came within the scope of the Joint-Stock Company Registration Act, which was the question now at issue.

Payne, on behalf of the respondent, submitted that the Act of Parliament in question was clearly intended to apply to railways, as well as to any other description of joint-stock undertaking. He cited the 4th section of the Act in question, and said that, after enumerating various descriptions of works, it concluded by the words, "whether for executing any such work as aforesaid under the authority of the Act of Parliament, or for any other purpose, the same should be registered in accordance with the provisions of the Act." He reminded the Court that it was exceedingly important for the public to know who were the originators and promoters of these schemes; and in confirmation of his opinion, that they came within the scope of the Act of Parliament, he said he was in a condition to prove that almost up to that very day it had been the practice to register all such undertakings.

Wallinger admitted that this might have been done, but that did not alter the case. The question was a very nice one, and until the decision to which he had referred, there might have been some doubt upon the point, but it was now quite settled.

The Court, after a short consultation, quashed the conviction.

Wallinger applied for full costs.

The Court, however, said they did not think it was a case in which they could allow more than the usual amount of forty shillings.

COURT OF CHANCERY.—Lord Cottenham attended court on Thursday as Lord Chancellor. His lordship was accompanied by the Master of the Rolls, the Vice-Chancellor of England, the Vice-Chancellor Wigram, and Master Wingfield. The customary oaths were tendered to his lordship by the clerk of the crown, and when the usual declaration had been signed the other judges retired.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, Guildhall, Tuesday.

—Our usual report of legal proceedings, we deeply regret, must this day give place to the sad intelligence of the death, last night, of the learned, dignified, and most amiable personage who presided over this court. As Lord Chief Justice Sir N. C. Tindal has for the period of upwards of 16 years admirably discharged every judicial duty, and both in his official character, and by his private virtues, he never failed justly to possess unqualified public confidence and respect, as well as the highest esteem and most sincere attachment of that profession which he so conspicuously adorned. The mention of the unexpected and melancholy tidings this morning threw a gloom over every individual present in the court, and as the intelligence spread, it was everywhere received by the members of the bar with that sincere feeling of sorrow which flows from the touching and homely reflection, that (as each expressed it) the deceased had never been known to give intentional offence, or be discourteous, either by word or gesture, to those who had the honour to practise before him, whether he were the most experienced senior, or a junior of the humblest standing. Mr. Justice Coltman, soon after the appointed hour of sitting this morning, entered the court, and stated that in consequence of the melancholy event which had happened the present sittings could no longer be held. Mr. Serjeant Talfourd then rose and said—My lord, I may be permitted to say, on behalf of myself and the bar, that we feel we could not now properly discharge our duties after the great calamity which has just befallen us. And thus the sittings terminated.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE CHIEF JUSTICE.—The funeral will take place on Monday morning next, when the mortal remains will be removed from Bedford-square for interment in the family vault at Kensal-green Cemetery. The ceremony will in every respect accord with the rank in life of the deceased.

Mr. Walpole, Mr. Bacon, and Mr. Rolt took their places within the bar, as of her Majesty's counsel.

SIR THOMAS WILDE.—It is somewhat singular that at the time of the late election Sir Thomas Wilde should have received during his stay in Worcester his appointment as Attorney-General; and that yesterday, on the eve of his second election, he should have received his elevation to the dignity of Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas. We presume that he will attend our assizes next week, in his judicial capacity.—Worcester Journal, July 6.

THE TEMPLE.—On Monday a deputation, composed of some of the members of the Bench of Lincoln's Inn, the Middle Temple, and Gray's Inn, and several learned lords, &c. who are interested and have been active in forwarding and discussing the subject of an improved system of legal education for students qualifying themselves for the bar, assembled in the Parliament Chamber of the Inner Temple, to partake of a banquet given to the deputations and other heads of the above-mentioned Inns of court. Amongst the company were—Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Brougham, Lord Campbell, Sir Charles Wetherall, Sir H. Jenner Fust, Sir John Beckett, Sir George Rose, Sir F. Thesiger, the treasurer of Lincoln's Inn, the treasurer of the Inner Temple, the treasurer of the Middle Temple, Dr. Lushington, Hrace Twiss, esq. T. Starkie, esq. W. Whately, esq. R. C. Hildyard, esq. D. Dundas, esq. W. Lee, esq. G. M. Butt, esq. Russell Gurney, esq. T. Purvis, esq. R. Bethell, esq. and C. T. Swanston, esq. Q.C. and John Wyatt, esq. a barrister of 56 years' standing.

INNS OF COURT GRAND DINNER.—On Tuesday evening an entertainment was given in the Hall of the Middle Temple, by the benchers of that society, to a large body of the benchers of the societies of Lincoln's Inn, the Inner Temple, and Gray's Inn. Amongst the assemblage were most of the leading members of the bar, and several eminent individuals who have gone through home and foreign judicial service.

HOME CIRCUIT.—HERTFORD, Thursday.—The commission for the county of Herts was opened this morning, at eleven o'clock, by Mr. Baron Parke, and his lordship and Mr. Justice Coltman afterwards attended Divine service. At one o'clock both courts proceeded to business, Baron Parke presiding in the Civil Side, and Mr. Justice Coltman in the Crown Court. The cause list is heavy for this county, there being twenty-three entered, seven or eight of which are special jury cases. The criminal calendar is light, there being only fourteen prisoners. None of the cases disposed of during the day contained any feature of public interest.

THE NEW IRISH CHANCELLOR.—The Dublin Evening Post makes the following observations on the appointment of Chief Baron Brady to the Chancery:—"That this appointment will cause universal satisfaction there is, there can be no doubt.

First, because he is an Irishman. Every one, no matter what his politics—every barrister in the hall—will rejoice at this appointment, because, for the first time almost, it opens the highest honour of the profession to the Irish bar. Hitherto this great office was considered the heirloom of some successful Chancery pleader in England. Hereafter, whatever changes and chances may come, it will be the reward of native merit and learning. We confess, however, we rejoice in the elevation of the Lord Chief Baron on his own account. His ability as a judge, his great talent, his learning, his readiness, his impartiality,—these are the themes of every man's eulogy. We are the humble echoes of the public voice in this regard. But we honour him for his high principle, for the steadiness of his devotion to the public cause, and for his love of constitutional liberty. If we might add another topic without offence, we should say we rejoice at the elevation of this man because we know the kindness and cordiality of his nature, and that he is utterly above affectation of any kind. In the dignity to which he is raised sure we are that he will forget no friend; and, happily for Lord Chancellor Brady, he has no foes to conciliate; he never had one."

The Ecclesiastical Commissioners propose, under the authority of a recent Act of Parliament, to abolish all the peculiar and prebendal jurisdictions throughout the kingdom, and to merge them in the archidiaconal and diocesan jurisdiction in which they are locally situated.—Globe.

METROPOLITAN BUILDINGS ACT.—On and after the 1st of July, 1846, it will not be lawful to let separately for hire as a dwelling, nor to occupy or suffer to be occupied as such, any underground room or cellar of which the surface of the floor is more than 3 feet below the surface of the footway of the nearest street or alley, unless there be an area on one side 3 feet wide in every part, and six inches lower than the floor of such room or cellar, and at least 5 feet in length in front of the window, and open, or covered only with open iron gratings; the window opening must be 9 superficial feet in area, and filled with glazed sashes, 4½ feet being made to open for ventilation; the room or cellar must also be 7 feet at least in height from floor to ceiling, and have an open fireplace with a proper flue therefrom. For the future any person letting or suffering to be occupied as a separate dwelling any underground room or cellar, contrary to the provisions of this Act, will, on conviction before two justices of the peace, be liable to forfeit for every day during which such room or cellar shall have been occupied a sum not exceeding 20s. one half to go to the person who sues for the same, and the remainder to the poor of the parish in which such unlawfully occupied room or cellar is situated.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY.—The Bill introduced by Mr. Hawes to amend the law relating to bankruptcy and insolvency, has been printed as amended by the committee. Two clauses have been added. It is provided by one of the new clauses, that on the non-appearance of a trader summoned, or his not satisfying the Court that he has a good defence, the Court may require him to give an account of his stock in trade, and a bond for duly carrying on his trade and accounting for it at the end of fourteen days. Power is proposed to be given to the Court of Bankruptcy to withhold protection from arrest to bankrupts and insolvents, under the several Acts relating to them. There are now 37 clauses in the measure. Creditors who prove in bankruptcy or insolvency may be regarded as judgment creditors, and the provision for the purpose was inserted a long time before Lord Brougham brought forward his Bill, which has just been printed.

HIGH SHERIFFS, "SIXTY YEARS SINCE."—There is a tradition on the Oxford circuit that Judge Buller once met at the first assize town with a very unsophisticated sheriff, who bluntly demanded of his lordship, as he was stepping into his carriage, whether he was a bona fide judge (the worthy functionary made but one syllable of judge), as they had been so often fobbed off with sergeants in those parts? When satisfied on this important particular he took his seat aside of the judge. A grave severity on the countenance of Mr. Justice Buller occasioned some misgivings in the mind of the sheriff, who expressed his fear that he had done something wrong. "It is certainly," said his lordship, with a smile, "against etiquette on these occasions for the sheriff to take his seat fronting the horses, unless,"—he put his hand on the gentleman who was starting up—"unless invited by the judge, as I now invite you." Craddock tells a story of a learned predecessor's encounter with another sheriff, not unamusing. The world was then not so highly refined as at present. After the usual opening of common topics, such as the roads and the weather, the high sheriff began to feel himself a little more emboldened, and ventured to ask his lordship whether, at the last place, he had gone to see the elephant? The judge with great good humour, replied—"Why no, Mr. High Sheriff, I cannot say that I did, for a little difficulty occurred; we both came into the town in form, with the trumpet sounding before us, and there was a point of ceremony to be settled, which should visit first."

to be administered. This expense, we think, could not be objected to, when it is considered that it will ensure the perfect safety of the property.

We further recommend that private trustees and executors should be enabled, under proper limits, to relieve themselves from all future trouble and responsibility, upon passing their accounts, accounting for all property, and consenting to a transfer of the trust estates to the management of a commissioner. We also think that increased facilities should be given to cestui que trusts to remove improper trustees and executors, and to secure trust property from further danger and mismanagement.

GENERAL MEETING, JULY 1, 1846.

Mr. Commissioner FONBLANQUE in the Chair. The minutes of the last meeting (the 3rd of June last) were read and confirmed.

Mr. James Stewart gave notice that he would move on the 15th of July for "a Special Committee to consider the best means of extending the range of the Society's operations."

The report of the committee on the Law of Property on the following reference was presented:—"To consider whether, in connexion with a general register, the principle of insurance of titles might not be introduced." It was agreed that the report should be further considered at the next meeting.

Adjourned till Wednesday, the 15th inst. at half-past four o'clock precisely.

THE SOCIETY FOR THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—The report of the "Society for the Amendment of the Law," printed in your paper of the 4th inst. is, to my humble comprehension, a development of that extraordinary state of things now existing in this country, viz. legislating out of Parliament. For what has Parliament now to do but to print, register, and publish the emanations of bodies of men who, whether for good or evil, erect themselves into quasi legislative bodies, and carry their results to the Houses of Parliament, to be passed into laws, whether the Government will or no? The Anti Corn-Law League was a pregnant example of this way of doing the business of the country; but at all events the League had the honesty and the decency to give all parties interested a fair trial, and were not sparing in time or argument to impart conviction to those who differed from them. In the short space of eighteen months, according to their report, the Society for the Amendment of the Law has arisen, a Minerva, armed in full proof, and absolute in sapience, arrogating to itself the wisdom of eighteen centuries, and propounding and carrying changes greater than in those eighteen centuries have been attempted. The self-gratulation, the undoubted confidence, the expression of universal good-will, and excellent intentions, interlarded in the document, are well calculated to mislead a general reader. The "passing of a bill through the House of Lords without a dissentient voice;" the "lawyers ourselves, considering the maintenance of the law in an honourable and prosperous state, beneficial not only to the lawyer but to his client," are ad captandum sentences which draw off attention from the railroad speed, and more than railroad rashness, with which this body rushes in medias res, cutting up the old plantations of the law, and putting in a few scanty shrubs, of which experience alone can determine the growth or value. I have before stated, and still assert it, that the Acts already carried by this body of men do not deserve the encomiums they bestow on them. For instance, the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 76, for simplifying the assurance of property, abolishes contingent remainders, and executory devises, and contains two clauses (inter alia) enabling executors, &c. of mortgagees to convey the legal estate instead of the heir, on payment of the mortgage, and to give receipts. The Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, repeals this Act, and revives contingent remainders, but expunges the two clauses relating to mortgagees, which would have been practically beneficial, and would, without injuring the attorney, have benefited the client. If this is good and safe legislation, what may not be done to torture the law?

But, say these "lawyers ourselves," Should we hurt the profession? None are less trustworthy than such reformers. What sort of lawyers are they? Attorneys? No. The attorney is a mutum et serile pecus, only named to be laughed down, and made the stalking-horse of all-sided Committees, who, because they cannot invent other burthens on land, rake up the stale charge of the expenses of conveyancing. The Society shews you the way in which they will benefit the Profession. The Act for abolishing the Assignment of Terms has, according to their report, saved 200,000*l.* in one year. Now I readily grant that, if this measure is a general benefit, the extent of loss to the Profession (and no mean one is it) should not hinder its operation. But I deny that it is of so great a benefit, and I doubt much whether time will not in many instances verify my denial. That improvement in this direction was impracticable, I do not say, but not the sort alluded to. It appears to them matter of congratulation that there was not a dissentient voice in the Lords to their Bills now before the House of Commons. Any candid reformer would regret that there was not. But who was to open his mouth to have it closed by such men as Lords Brougham and Campbell? What lord is there so bold and disinterested as to dare avow himself an opponent to such inspired Lycurguses? As you emphatically say, we have no one to speak for us, and so measures pass without one of the safeguards we are entitled to. I defy any one to shew how the Society proposed even to compensate the loss to the Profession. Length, they say, is not to be the criterion of remuneration, but they do not say what is. Oh, but say they, it will be no loss; it will be a gain. Increase of small conveyances! Mere words. Where is the land to come from? Have not great proprietors increased latterly; and is it likely they will parcel out their land? Is it not very doubtful that such parcelling out is desirable? Amongst the members of this very Society I think I could point out some who are of that opinion. Of much about the same value are all other promises of this nature. But unless the present Government think it right to check the speed of these gentlemen, the die is apparently cast. The Law Institution has basely betrayed the confidence of the Profession, and has shewn its aptitude to encourage jobs, instead of protecting its members. No one appears to reflect for a moment that our still complicated tenures—freehold, copyhold, leasehold, &c.—are not likely to yield to ultra-simple measures of reform, or that such measures may not eventually cause greater confusion still. No one seems to think it desirable to see what may be done to simplify the tenure of land, before simplifying its mode of transfer. This might clash with the interests of some members of the Society. Nor do I see that the grievances of the Profession are even alluded to as such. The shameful amount of fees, stamps, &c.—these do not call for the attention of the Society. The abolition or modification of the latter, and the charging fees on the consolidated fund, would relieve the Profession, and must not be thought of. No, the screw must be tightened. It is coolly proposed to consider "whether the machinery of the public funds cannot be applied to the transfer of real property." This comes at an auspicious moment; the moment when Mr. Richard Cobden has been ballotted a member of the Society. What must follow, but "Free trade in Law," and every man his own attorney? and when this consummation is brought about, it may be discovered that Lord Mansfield was right when he said that every such person had a fool for his client. I am, Sir, yours,

P.S.—Not Puck, as misprinted in your last number.

SELECTIONS FROM CORRESPONDENCE.

"A Devonshire Attorney" submits these remarks on "Short Conveyances":—

It appears to me marvellously strange that the Profession should be so apathetic respecting the impending changes, which must so seriously affect it. Is it spell-bound, and prepared to fall, an unresisting victim? or are all the leading members so engrossed by Railway business, that they can't spare time to think about "Short Conveyances." I, as a country attorney of small influence, have been week by week anxiously expecting your valuable columns would contain some definite propositions, emanating from some of your able correspondents, shewing what should be done, and how it should be done. Your article in the LAW TIMES of the 4th inst. really startles me. Is it indeed probable that the Bill will be passed without any countervailing clauses? Are the profits of the attorney to be seriously curtailed? and are conveyancers, land agents, surveyors, auctioneers, et id genus omne, to be allowed to share the poor remains? This is a very serious question, for it needs no conjuror to foretell that when there are statutory forms for all sorts of deeds, not only will the learned gentlemen above mentioned be quite sure that they are competent to the task of preparing them, but purchasers and mortgagees will also deem them competent. And now, Sir, if the Act passes, and this anticipated infringement of what ought to be our exclusive privileges is not prevented, what is to become of the country attorneys, whose practice is mainly conveyancing? A friend of mine says conveyances will be sold in stationers' shops at three-halfpence per dozen. Lest I should trespass on your space, I will say nothing about the Certificate Duty. Permit me to tender you my thanks for your endeavours to stir up the slumbering energies of the Profession. I have from the first been a subscriber to the LAW TIMES, and my sole motive for originally subscribing was, the anticipation that it would be a powerful organ to protect the interests of the Profession in those times of change which were then foreshadowed. It has been a watchful and judicious guardian. If the members of our Profession were united, it would be amply and speedily illustrated that "union is strength." Let me entreat you to sound the alarm louder and louder still, until the lethargy under which the Profession as a body is now existing, be effectually dispelled, and that before it is too late. I do not feel myself competent to originate, but I shall be happy to follow, in any course calculated to sustain our rights. I can hardly tell you how absurdly extravagant Mr. Baxter's scale of costs appears.

A Correspondent inquires, "how a person who finds from the lists that there are unclaimed dividends, standing in his name, or his trustees', in the books of the Bank of England, is to proceed to ascertain the amount, and to recover the same."

DEATH OF SIR NICHOLAS TINDAL.

It is with profound sorrow that we record the almost sudden death of one who was justly the pride of the Profession—Sir NICHOLAS TINDAL, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.

The details of his death—the story of his life—will be found in another place. But it would ill become a journal whose columns have been so largely adorned by the profound learning, the clear logical argument, and the simple but graceful language, of him who presided over the Common Pleas for so many years, with so much honour to himself and advantage to the community, to note the melancholy event in its legal history of the time, without adding its mite to the universal expression of genuine sorrow at the loss we have sustained.

Whatever the influence of party and sectarian feeling upon the good fame of all other men in office; however other institutions and their dignitaries are attacked in the indiscriminate rage of political warfare, it is a proud reflection that the Legal Tribunals of England have never found an enemy, and their judges no assailants. The fiercest democrat—the wildest lover of change—he who would dethrone the monarch, despoil the Church, and abolish the Peerage—never breathes a whisper against the Judges. They are the only persons who command the respect of all parties and sects and may boast that they have not an enemy. This is the result of the unblemished manner in which the Judges have discharged the functions of their high office. For generations not even a shadow of suspicion has dimmed the purity of their ermine. It would seem as if, when they ascended the judgment-seat, they were enabled to put away the passions and prejudices of human nature. Pre-eminently was this manifested in Sir NICHOLAS TINDAL.

A more perfect Judge never adorned the Bench. He united extensive legal knowledge with an extraordinary aptitude for applying it to the ever-varying circumstances of society. His patience was unbounded; no trouble was too great where it helped to a clearer view of the case under consideration; his courtesy to the Bar was a model for the bearing of a Judge to the Counsel practising before him, especially in the kindness with which he would listen to a junior, and appear to overlook the embarrassed manner in attention to the matter; not a tone or gesture of impatience was there, but, on the contrary, an aspect of encouragement that inspired the timid.

And the same innate kindness of heart attended him in the performance of the painful duties of the Criminal Court. The poor prisoner looked in the face of this Judge, and instead of severity he saw pity, and where he had dreaded a stern foe he found a gentle friend. Sir NICHOLAS TINDAL believed that his duty was not punishment alone, but to see that the prisoner had all the protection which the law has provided; to secure conviction only where guilt was beyond reasonable doubt, and when that was fully established, his sentences were distinguished for considerate mildness; he looked at the motives to crime, measured the temptations, and the criminal and the spectators were assured that no more punishment was inflicted than the circumstances of the case demanded; and all felt that it was with pain and sorrow the sentence was pronounced.

With such a presiding Judge, it was the more to be lamented that the Court of Common Pleas should have been almost closed against the public. We are selfish enough to regret that we had not more frequent opportunities for hearing his lucid commentaries upon mercantile law. No long time will elapse before the Court he adorned must be thrown open to the whole Profession, and take its share of the general business of the country; and 'it adds to the regret that he who had ruled it so well should not have survived to conduct its first grappleings with the rush of business, which the quality of its Bench is sure to attract to it, as soon as its Bar shall be opened to the free competition of the entire Profession.

THE LATE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

LET others worship the rising sun; be it ours to pay the homage due to the lustre of that which has departed.

Sir FREDERICK THESIGER retires with the undivided respect and esteem of all parties. Never was the office of Attorney-General filled by one who, in every particular, was so blameless. He reflected more of honour and dignity upon his office than it conferred upon him. Yet did it not lift him for a moment above himself. The first Law Officer of the Crown was as kind, as courteous, as affable as considerate to a junior, as unaffected, as ever he was when struggling onward to fame and fortune. Sir FREDERICK THESIGER retires with this proud and perhaps unparalleled boast, that during his term of office he has not once employed the extraordinary powers with which the law has armed him for any political offence. Ex officio in his hands have become rusty; may they not grow bright again in the hands of his successors.

TOUTING FOR BRIEFS.

THE police reports, some days since, contained a curious examination of a Jew who lurks about the Old Bailey and the police-offices, and who asserted that he made a livelihood by procuring briefs for barristers, for each of which he was allowed the liberal sum of half-a-crown. He named one of his pretended patrons.

After the much that is reported, and the more that is known, though not proved, of the "going-on" at the Old Bailey, and how business there is brought into particular channels, the Jew's confident assertion upon his oath did not take us by surprise, but we looked eagerly to see if it would be contradicted by the parties concerned. We were pleased to find that, on the following day, an emphatic and unreserved contradiction was given to the Jew's evidence. Three or four gentlemen indignantly denied the charge, and protested that they had never before seen the fellow who made it.

What does such a gratuitous story-teller deserve?—a fellow who, for no purpose that can be conceived, thus deliberately swears to what so many gentlemen assert to be false?

No doubt can now exist in any mind as to the Jew being utterly unknown to the learned counsel who so indignantly repudiated his acquaintance.

But it would have been more satisfactory if their clerks had made a similar declaration. Usually, it is those naughty clerks that do such naughty things. They cannot understand the nice sense of professional honour that governs their masters. In their green-eyed simplicity they will sometimes get briefs from their friends, Christian as well as Jew, in a manner their masters never could or would sanction, if they knew it; only they don't know!

LEGAL EDUCATION.

MR. WYSE'S Committee is still pursuing its labours, and has been carrying its inquiries into every branch of the Profession. A great deal of interesting, useful, and curious information will be elicited upon a subject about which there has hitherto prevailed, both within and without the Profession, a remarkable ignorance. As soon as the report is printed, it will be made the subject of repeated review here. In the meanwhile, we recommend all who can help the researches of the Committee to forward their suggestions. They will receive whatever consideration their merits may deserve.

SHAM LAWYERS.

WE have before us some more of these performances.

A Mr. H. BALL, of Bodmin, advertises himself as a schoolmaster and law-stationer, with the following note:—

N.B. Wills made, debts collected, conveyances, mortgages, agreements, leases, bonds, bills, notes, and other securities, copied or engrossed.

Here is a neatly lithographed circular, which we copy, but suppressing the names of the writers, as, probably, they would be more pleased than annoyed to be advertised here. It is, perhaps, scarcely necessary to warn our readers against being entrapped by any such applications.

Gentlemen,—Having been led to the consideration of the necessity of establishing upon economical principles an office for the exclusive purpose of conducting the miscellaneous business of country solicitors, we respectfully beg to submit to you this circular.

It is obvious that the description of business alluded to, which is at present conducted by the agents in London, can be performed by any individual who has been at all accustomed to the general routine of a professional office in town; and it is with the view of saving what we conceive to be unnecessary expense to country gentlemen that we propose to commence this new undertaking.

The miscellaneous business will comprise everything which does not require the direct interference of a solicitor; such as all matters in connection with the Stamp Office, making up and passing residuary accounts, paying legacy duties, stamping deeds, &c.; searching for judgments, and all other searches of what nature soever; filing the acknowledgments of married women; registering and obtaining the execution of deeds; registering judgments; filing warrants of attorney; enrolling deeds and specifications; obtaining certificates of baptism and burial; all matters connected with the Prerogative Court (not requiring the interference of a proctor), the Bank, East India House, and such other public offices as may properly come under the cognizance of the proposed establishment.

The plan upon which we propose to proceed as regards remuneration will be one-third of the full fees as at present charged, but should we succeed in obtaining the patronage we are seeking, it is possible we may be able to reduce the expense to a much lower scale.

We beg further to add, that the business entrusted to us will be confided to persons immediately interested, and all transactions will, therefore, be carried on strictly upon private and confidential principles.

We shall be obliged by a reply at your early convenience, and, if favourable, we shall be happy to furnish you with our references.

NECROLOGY

DEATH OF LORD CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.

(From the Times.)

THE earthly career of the late Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas has been terminated rather suddenly. About ten days ago he attended the hearing of an Irish appeal in the House of Lords—Sheehy v. Lord Muskerry. On leaving the house he complained of excessive heat, and appeared to be almost fainting. He was, within a few hours, seized with paralysis of the left leg, extending, as we understand, to the hipjoint; and, after the lapse of two or three days, his medical adviser recommended him to proceed to the seaside. Without delay he repaired to Folkestone, accompanied by his son, Captain Tindal; but there he unhappily experienced a renewal of his alarming malady. Several members of his family were summoned, though little more than in time to witness his dissolution. He expired on Monday evening at half-past 7 o'clock, to the inexpressible grief of his family and numerous friends, as well as to the great regret of the public at large—for he was one of the most popular as well as the most eminent judges that ever adorned the bench of justice.

Sir Nicolas Conyngham Tindal was in the 70th year of his age, having been born in 1776. There was, however, a general impression that his birth took place some years earlier than that day, for, though hale and vigorous, he seemed to be rather older than threescore-and-ten. It is also generally supposed that he was a native of Buckinghamshire; but of this there can be no doubt, that he is descended from an old Essex family, and that his father, Robert Tindal, who was a solicitor, resided for many years, if not the whole of his life, at Chelmsford, in Essex. There is a Mr. Tindal, brother to the late Chief Justice, who practises as a solicitor in Aylesbury, but we have every reason to believe that the subject of this notice was born at Chelmsford. After the usual course of school education, he entered at Trinity College, Cambridge, in the year 1795, and within four years of that period—in 1799—he took the degree of A.B. and that of A.M. in 1802. In the former year he was eighth wrangler and senior Chancellor's medallist. In the month of October, 1801, he was elected a fellow of his college, and held the fellowship for eight years. Immediately after taking his Master's degree, he became a student of Lincoln's-inn, by which society he was eventually called to the bar. His connexion with Lincoln's-inn probably gave rise to the common error that he had been a Chancery barrister; but, on the contrary, his practice was limited to the common law courts. Shortly after his admission to Lincoln's-inn, he entered upon practice, and with very considerable success, as a special pleader, and Lord Brougham stated that he had been among the number of his pupils. There can be no question that a young law student could hardly have chosen a safer guide, for a man more thoroughly learned than Mr. Tindal even then was, in every department of the law, could scarcely be found within the range of the profession; and he was especially celebrated for what is called "black letter learning." His high reputation brought him so many clients that at a very early age he thought it safe to go to the bar, and accordingly we find that he was called in Trinity Term, 1803. In the same year he married the youngest daughter of the late Captain Thomas Symonds, R.N. and, of course, resigned his fellowship. A numerous family were the issue of this marriage, but the wife of Sir Nicolas Tindal died many years ago. In the Court of King's Bench, and on the Northern Circuit, every year brought Mr. Tindal additional reputation as a lawyer, but very little fame as an advocate. He was never at a loss for a case; he could always expound a principle; he could give the history of any statute, and with great perspicuity set forth its provisions; he could argue any point, however apparently hopeless, and impeach the validity of any legal document, however apparently sound; but a knavish witness could elude his examination, and an apathetic jury were never warmed by his eloquence; yet he had what the profession calls a "capital business;" and a large income rewarded his learning, his industry, and his high reasoning faculties. The natural process by which lawyers seek advancement in their profession is to get into Parliament. Mr. Tindal, however, enjoyed a distinguished opportunity of appearing before one house of Parliament long before his election as a member of the other. A bill of pains and penalties was preferred against the Queen of George IV. and in one of the most extraordinary proceedings that our history records, Mr. Tindal was called upon to bear his part. He, conjointly with several others, was counsel for the Queen. How far his astuteness and knowledge rendered him an efficient assistant to her Majesty's Attorney-General was a matter not very apparent at that period. That he was capable of giving valuable hints to his more showy brethren, Lords Brougham and Denman, there can be no doubt, but his oratory was not of the order to neutralize the dazzling ingenuity of Copley or to cope with the wily manoeuvres of a cloud of Italian witnesses. Hence, though he enjoyed the honour of being a Queen's advocate, he obtained with the public little additional reputation from his share in this extraordinary inquiry. We now follow him to the House of Commons, to which assembly in the year 1824 he was returned by the Wigton district of burghs; and here also we can say but little for his qualifications as a public speaker. His manner was cold, dry, and unimpassioned; his political and historical knowledge displayed itself to small advantage; it bore upon few questions, and not even upon those with much power. One would have expected that his talents and learning as a lawyer must have often enabled him to enlighten the House on legal difficulties, but yet he had not a popular mode of discussing even questions of law. Nevertheless, a better man for the office of Solicitor-General could not be found amongst the Tory lawyers in the month of September, 1826, when Sir C. Wetherell became Attorney-General, in consequence of the elevation of Sir John Copley, afterwards Lord Lyndhurst, to the Mastership of the Rolls. At this time Mr. Tindal became Sir Nicolas, but he still remained without any very material increase of professional fame, nor was he called upon during his tenure of office to assist in any important prosecution on behalf of the Crown. Sir J. Copley, who had represented the University of Cambridge, became Lord Chancellor in the year 1827, during the Canning Administration; thereupon a vacancy occurred in the representation of that constituency, and Sir Nicolas Tindal solicited its suffrages. Mr. William John Banks, though also a Tory, went down to Cambridge to oppose him; the result of the polling was 479 for Sir Nicolas Tindal, and 378 for Mr. Banks. He had been chosen for Harwich at the general election in 1826, but of course readily withdrew from that borough to enjoy the honour of representing his alma mater. Eventually, however, he became perfectly satisfied with two years' possession of this much envied distinction. Gout, irritability, and Sir Thomas Wilde, combined their united virulence to drive poor Lord Wynford almost beside himself. The chief seat in the Common Pleas, therefore, became vacant, and a prize within the grasp of the Solicitor-General. Sir Robert Peel represented Oxford, Sir Nicolas Tindal Cambridge; the one was leading minister in the lower House, and the other second law officer of the Crown; the one proposed Catholic emancipation, the other supported it; the one retained his place in the Cabinet and lost his seat for Oxford; the member for Cambridge gave up his seat for that university, but obtained a seat upon the bench; and in the month of June, 1829, became Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, which position he occupied during the long period of seventeen years; although, under the 6th of Geo. 4, cap. 83, he might, at the end of fifteen years, have claimed exoneration from the toils of that high station. Death, however, has at length deprived him of its honours and relieved him of its labours. Sir Thomas Wilde will soon occupy the situation which he filled on the bench, although few men are qualified to supply the place which he held in the public esteem. If he had any faults, he certainly possessed many most shining qualities as a judge. Gentlemen of the bar who practise in a given court may never be able to agree amongst each other, or with the public, respecting the merits of any judge who occupies a seat on the bench of that Court; still less can they be brought to anything like an admission that any judge at any time was ever wholly faultless. The public, however, are not remarkable for such nice fastidiousness; but, with less knowledge and far less fastidiousness, they pronounce an unqualified opinion, either to the great discredit or the infinite honour of the personage who may at the time have become the subject of their notice. As to the merits of Chief Justice Tindal the bar may be divided, but the public are unanimous. They look at his "summings-up" as among the most masterly exhibitions of judicial sagacity, and they regarded his calm, thoughtful, and tranquil inflexibility as the impersonation of British justice. They admired the vigour and promptitude with which he would cast the light of a clear and searching intellect upon some vast accumulation of minute facts, inferences, and expositions,—how he would track out a plain and palpable path amidst some labyrinth of contradictory evidences. The world viewed with admiration the manner in which he threw aside the sophistries and disentangled the forensic perplexities with which cases are sometimes enveloped,—how he dissipated the obscurities, lopped off the irrelevancies, curtailed the redundancies which had been imported into the cause by the weak or wily advocate, and finally how he reduced the real point in dispute to its strict and indisputable merits. Such was the impression that the character of Chief Justice Tindal made upon the community at large; and, whatever criticism his alleged eccentricities might occasionally provoke, among the members of the bar, all was forgotten in the intervals between one Term and another, while his imperturbable temper, the uniform amenity of his manner, his perfect independence of spirit, his high integrity, and great judicial abilities, were always present to the mind of every observer.

We extract the following eloquent and truthful eulogium from the Daily News—

The tidings of the death of Sir Nicolas Tindal, which so deeply shocked the court over which he had so long presided, and brought its sittings abruptly to a close, will be deeply felt by all who revere the pure administration of justice. Few judges who have died in our remembrance have left us so much to admire, and none so much to love. More distinguished, when an advocate, by the depth of his learning, and the cogency of his arguments, than by the brilliancy of his declamation; more adapted for the work of convincing the Court, than of persuading or dazzling a jury; he brought to the judgment-seat a mind more unruffled by passion, a nature less disturbed by the vehemence of advocacy, than eminent judges who have passed many years in the achievement of great Nisi Prius success have been able to preserve. In this aptitude for the judicial office, he resembled the late Lord Tenterden; like him, a pleader and a scholar; with less vigour, perhaps, of legal intellect, but with an amenity and sweetness of disposition which rendered authority charming, and which the late Chief Justice of the King's Bench did not care to cherish. Like Lord Tenterden, he was deeply grounded in the principles of commercial law, and felicitous in applying them to the varying aspects of busy life; and if he did not so largely expand our unwritten code by new application of its principles to the exigencies of the times, he illumined the doctrines established by others with the clearest exposition, and adorned them with unrivalled grace of style. The distinctness of his perceptions gave to the language of his judgments, when pronounced without more consideration than the press of the argument allowed, a precision and an elegance which even the long deliberation and jealous art of Lord Stowell could not improve. In mere correctness, Lord Tenterden's language might be equal to Tindal's; but it fell short in the happy selection of words, and in the pellucid beauty of arrangement, to which it was a luxury to listen.

In presiding over trials at Nisi Prius, Lord Chief Justice Tindal was distinguished by impartiality and patience. He was not in a hurry, even to be just. The strenuous labour with which he not only recorded the minutest details of verbal evidence, but transcribed all important passages of documents,—often preserving all the essence of a long correspondence on his notes,—proved his earnest anxiety to attain truth, and secure the means of revising his own possible errors. If in the performance of this great feature of his duty there was any failure, it arose from the want of moral indignation at discovered baseness. He was too rarely touched with noble anger. His gentle nature, shrinking from the infliction of pain, sometimes deprived the Profession of that salutary lesson which the denunciation of base endeavours to pervert justice has given, in the just rage of Ellenborough, in the sharp rebuke of Tenterden, and in the generous scorn of Cresswell. But this graceful timidity of disposition, while it weakened the collateral influence of those episodes in causes which develop the character of the parties who conduct them, rarely, if ever, prevented a correct conclusion on the direct issues for trial, and never interfered with the discharge of his duty in criminal causes. In hearing these—where the occasion for censure was not incidental, but involved in the very issue to be tried—he was "settled and bound up" to the work of justice, and allowed no weakness or misgiving to interfere between the criminal and his doom. Yet, in this character, no judge ever won more completely the reluctant praise of those whom he was compelled to punish. On the trials of Frost and his associates, and in those which followed the outbreaks in Staffordshire (although his political opinions and feelings were known to be directly opposite to those of all who favoured the accused; and although his sentences, when discretionary, were not marked by leniency when compared with those of other judges), the calm impressiveness of his manner—the patient attention which, even when wearied, never failed—the personal courtesy with which the human being, however perverted or debased, was regarded—the pitying tones and unaffected dignity with which judgment was pronounced—made all confess, that if justice had ever seemed more awful, it never had been more passionless and serene. It is too soon yet to call to mind in detail the charms of his conversation; the fine intellectual wit—the sparkling epigrammatic wisdom—the almost feminine delicacy of touch, with which all topics were handled. These were the traits which rendered the picture complete to the eyes of those privileged to inspect it closely and in happy hours. But the prominent features of his judicial character, which time need not soften and even death cannot make more sacred, are at this moment impressed on the heart of our country as those of one of the greatest and best of her judges.

ROBERT MAUGHAM RICHARDS, ESQ.

We have to record the decease of one of the most respected, if indeed not one of the most eminent members of the English bar—Robert Maugham

Richards, esq., whose name must be familiar to many of our readers. He expired on Thursday last at his residence in Whitehall-place, aged 53. The complaint which proved fatal to the learned gentleman was an affection of the spine of long standing. Symptoms first manifested themselves about four years since, when Mr. Richards was in the height of practice; and such were the apprehensions entertained of the result, that he adopted the advice of his medical attendants by retiring from the bar, resolving to spend the remainder of his days in comparative retirement, having previously, it is understood, amassed a handsome independence by his professional exertions during a period of nearly twenty-four years. For some time previous to the fatal attack he apparently enjoyed fair health; and although he abated in a great degree, if not wholly, from all professional duties, he nevertheless moved in another character—that of a philanthropist, and was an active supporter of many of our most beneficial charitable institutions. He was one of the coadjutors of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge in the formation of the Governnesses' Benevolent Institution, and took a deep interest in its proceedings up to the last few days of his earthly career.

THE CRITIC.

New Books.

Common Forms in Conveyancing, including Recitals. By CHARLES DAVIDSON, of the Middle Temple, Esq. Barrister-at-Law. London, 1846. Maxwell and Co.

COMMON FORMS are precisely those which the practitioner most wants, and never knows where to find. If a solicitor is called upon to prepare a difficult conveyance, he will be sure to find a precedent somewhere; but if something extremely simple is required, and his memory will not serve him as to the precise words usually employed, he hunts through his bulky tomes in a vain attempt to discover a guide. No book has condescended to embalm it in print, because it is so simple; being common, it is presumed to be known to everybody, and not unfrequently it happens that the man who is the most learned in law, and most prompt in a matter of profound law, is most perplexed about a common form.

It is to supply this defect that Mr. DAVIDSON has published this volume. It contains all the forms in ordinary use in conveyancing; indeed, all that a solicitor ought ever to use; for, if more difficult ones are demanded, the case is one in which it would be his duty to seek the aid of counsel.

The Law of Loan Societies. By JOHN GREENWOOD, M.A. Barrister-at-Law. Benning and Co. A Treatise on Annuities, with an Appendix, containing the Statutes on the subject. By CHARLES RANN KENNEDY, Esq. Barrister-at-Law. London: Benning and Co.

THE first of these pamphlets contains, in addition to the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 110, an introductory notice of loan societies, their objects and uses. The other is an essay on annuities, originally written for the Useful Knowledge Society, but now adapted for lawyers by the addition of the statutes. Both are copiously indexed.

SALE OF THE WHITEKNIGHTS ESTATE.—This highly picturesque domain, formerly the seat of the late Duke of Marlborough, was submitted to public competition by Mr. F. Chinnock, on Thursday, at the Railway Hotel, Reading. The whole estate, including the well-known botanical and American gardens, and delightful wilderness, forming upwards of 284 acres, was first offered in one lot, with a view to retain its original features, but no sufficiently enterprising capitalist was met with. The property was then put up in sixty-four lots, and a spirited competition took place. This division will lead to the erection, by the several purchasers, of detached ornamental villa residences, which will prove an ornament to the adjacent town. The Wilderness, a charming and romantic retreat, comprising thirty-six acres in extent, which was disposed of in one lot, will happily remain entire. Some portion of the land sold in lots realized from 150l. to 200l. per acre.

SALE OF FORD ABBEY.—On Thursday the sale by auction of the Ford Abbey estate took place at the Auction Mart, and excited considerable competition. It is situated in the Vale of the Aze, Dorsetshire, and consists of about 1,200 acres of rich land, with the park, and realized a rent approaching 2,000l. per annum. It was, about the year 1815, let for a few years to the celebrated Jeremy Bentham, during the temporary sojourn of the late proprietor on the continent. The abbey dates its origin as far back as the year 1136, the first year of King Stephen. The Courtneys were a long while patrons of the abbey, and about the year 1690 it came into the family of the Gwyns, in which it has continued. The timber, fixtures, and deer were to be taken at a valuation. The property was sold for 52,000l. and bought by a gentleman of the name of Gwyn.

VICE-CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND'S COURT.

BROOKS v. LAKE.

Bequest of personality—Tenant for life—Effect of words of inheritance—Absolute gift.
A testator gave a sum of money to each of his four sisters named in his will, providing, however, that "should it so happen that the whole should die without heirs, the sum is ultimately to revert to the estate of the family; but should all or any of them die, with heirs of their body, the sum of which they severally die possessed is to be continued to their heirs for ever, and not to revert to the estate." Held, that under this disposition the legatees were entitled to absolute interests.

The Honourable George Augustus Frederick Lake, by his last will and testament, bearing date 19th of March, 1808, gave, among other legacies, as follows: "To the Hon. Mrs. Brooks, my sister, 4,000l.; to the Hon. Mrs. Harvey, my sister, 4,000l.; to the Hon. Frances Lake, my sister, 4,000l.; to the Hon. Anne Lake, my sister, 4,000l.; to the Hon. Warwick Lake, my brother, 4,000l. for ever. The respective sums left to my sisters, Annabell Brooks, Elizabeth Harvey, Frances Lake, and Anne Lake, are, in the event of either of them dying without heirs, to be equally divided between the survivors of the four above-mentioned; and should it so happen that the whole should die without heirs, the sum is ultimately to revert to the estate of the family; but should all or any of them die without heirs of their body, the sum of which they severally die possessed is to be continued to their heirs for ever, and not to revert to the estate. The sum left to my brother Warwick is his for ever." The testator gave the residue of his property unto and equally between his brother, Francis Gerard Lord Lake, and his brother-in-law, Richard Borough. The testator died in the month of August 1808. Anne Lake married John Wardlaw, and died in 1845, leaving several children. A suit having been instituted for the purpose of administering the testator's estate, Anne Wardlaw assigned her legacy, which had been carried over to her separate account, to the trustees of her marriage settlement; and the trustees of the settlement now petitioned that the money might be paid out to them; whereupon the question arose, whether Mrs. Wardlaw took an absolute interest in the bequest, or a life estate only with remainder to her children.

Bethell and Sidebottom, for the petitioners.
Stuart, on the other side, submitted that the words used by the testator could not be treated as a nullity, or as having no meaning; but that the testator must have intended that the children and grandchildren of Mrs. Wardlaw should have an interest in the fund.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR decided that Mrs. Wardlaw took an absolute interest, and that there was no limitation over which the Court could carry into effect.

Wednesday, July 1.

LEWIS v. BILLING.

Railway liabilities.

The bill charged that the managing committee of a certain railway, having assets in their hands, had paid or undertaken to pay, B. one of the defendants, a debt due to him on account of the said railway, and had used his name in an action against the plaintiff to recover the same debt, and prayed an injunction to restrain the action.

Demurrer on the ground of want of equity.

Held, that there was a plain equity against the defendant B. inasmuch as it was a matter of the grossest fraud that parties who have no beneficial interest in an action should harass the plaintiff in the defendant's name.

This was a demurrer to a bill filed by the plaintiff, who is a shareholder in the Wolverhampton, Chester, and Birkenhead Junction Railway (an undertaking which has failed), to restrain an action at law under these circumstances:—It appeared by the bill, that in the latter part of 1845 the above railway company was provisionally registered under the Joint Stock Act, and the managing committee proceeded to allot shares, and possessed themselves in that character of 3,000l. assets of the company; that there was a large sum of outstanding debts, and amongst the rest, a debt due to the defendant for printing and engraving. This debt was partly paid by the managing committee to the defendant, and partly to agents for him, and was then assigned by him to them; notwithstanding which he had brought an action against the plaintiff at the instance of the managing committee (the other defendants), by whom he was guaranteed and indemnified against any loss which might accrue by such a proceeding. The plaintiff then applied to the defendants, and requested them to refrain from suing him, or allowing him to be sued, which they refused, unless he would pay 100l. an amount arbitrarily named, but not shewn by any account to be his share of the liabilities of the company. This he refused to do. The bill then charged that the defendants threatened to distribute and divide the funds, without discharging the liabilities of the company; that the action by Billing was for a larger sum than was actually due to him, and that the other defendants held in their hands funds amply sufficient to discharge all the debts due from the company. The bill charged that the defendants had signed cheques for purposes not sanctioned by their Act; that the shareholders were very numerous, and the plaintiff could not discover their names; but charged that their interests were identical with those of the present defendants, and prayed an injunction to restrain the action by the defendant Billing, or by the other defendants in his name, and from distributing or dividing the assets of the company, except in discharge of the debts, and that all proper accounts might be taken and directions given, the plaintiff offering to pay whatever sum was properly due from him. To this bill a general demurrer was put in.

K. Parker and Hullett, in support of the demurrer, cited Fernihough v. Leader, decided by his Honour in May last, as distinguished from the present case.

Bethell and Adams in support of the bill.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, his opinion was, that this demurrer must be overruled. It might be perfectly true that, in detail, the case of Fernihough v. Leader and this case were not the same, nor was it necessary that they should be, in order that the principle on which the Court then decided should equally apply to this case. The bill, as it represented the circumstances, made out a plain equity at least as against Billing, because it represented that certain persons wished to form a company, and a company was formed to a certain extent, and debts were due from the company, and amongst the rest a debt due to Billing, for which he thought proper to sue the company; and what was alleged in the bill was, that the other defendants applied moneys in their hands to pay Billing's debt, for which he thought proper to sue the plaintiffs; it represented that, partly by payment to Billing and partly to agents for him, the whole was paid, but he afterwards assigned the debt to the other defendants, and allowed them to bring an action in his name. The bill was filed, not for forming a company, nor for dissolving a company, nor for carrying on or interfering with the affairs of the company, except that the moneys in the other defendants' hands might be applied for debts due. There was a plain equity against Billing; it was a matter of the grossest fraud that parties who had no beneficial interest in the action should be allowed to harass the plaintiff, when they themselves had moneys applicable for the payment of the debt. It was, as stated, a gross act of dishonesty, and a cogent case against Billing. Neither of the demurrers, for want of equity, parties, or multifariousness, was sustained. The pleader had drawn the bill concisely, and very properly so; and he (the Vice-Chancellor) was not sure whether this was not a speaking demurrer, the demurring party having taken upon himself to speak of an effect which might be produced, but which did not appear, and, therefore, upon the whole substance of the case, the demurrers must be overruled.

ROLLS COURT.

Monday, July 6.

BIDDULPH v. LORD CAMOYS.

Practice—New Orders—Guardian of person of unsound mind—Husband and wife.

Where a husband and wife were made defendants in a cause, and the husband was of unsound mind, but not so found by inquisition, the plaintiff applied, under the provisions of the 32nd of the New Orders, for an order of the Court to appoint a solicitor of the Court guardian of the husband, by whom he might appear and answer, and proposed that the wife's solicitor should be appointed; the Court refused the application.

An application to appoint the plaintiff's solicitor guardian was also refused; and the solicitor to the Sutors' Fund was appointed, he being the person commonly appointed in such cases.

Cooke applied, under the 32nd of the New Orders, on the part of the plaintiff in this cause, for an order to appoint a solicitor of the Court guardian to a defendant of unsound mind, by whom he might appear and answer; and proposed that Mr. Charles Addis, the solicitor of the wife of the defendant, who was also a defendant in the cause, might be appointed such guardian. He stated that the wife was or might be interested in the subject-matter of the suit, but that the husband was not, and therefore there was no adverse interest in him; and it would be convenient to have the wife's solicitor the guardian, inasmuch as the husband was under her care and management. She had been duly served with notice of the motion as directed by the 32nd Order, and though she did not appear, there would be no difficulty as to that.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—I don't think that right, and I will not allow it.

Cooke.—Well, will your Lordship allow Mr. Neeris, the plaintiff's solicitor, to be the guardian?

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—I cannot say the solicitor of the plaintiff is a proper person to be appointed in such cases.

Cooke.—Well, then, let the solicitor to the Sutors' Fund be appointed.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—Yes, I will. The solicitor of the wife may be a very proper person in himself to be appointed, but there is such a blending of interest between the husband and wife, that I could not rightly order the solicitor to be appointed his guardian.

Cooke.—Perhaps you would permit Mr. Charles Addis to act with him.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—No, I can't interfere with the solicitor to the Sutors' Fund exercising his discretion.

Saturday, June 27.

ROWLEY v. ADAMS.

Practice—Staying proceedings—Appeal.

An order was made in a cause for the sale of certain devised real estates, for the payment of legacies, with which they were charged in case the personal estate of the testator should prove insufficient. From this decree there was an appeal, and application was made to the Court to stay the sale till after the result of the appeal should be known, on the ground that, if the decree should be reversed, the sale would be unnecessary, and the devisees would be greatly injured by the sale; but the Court refused to oblige the legatees to wait the result, and only made the order on the consent of the plaintiffs, the parties being all members of the same family.

In this case a decree had been made to sell freehold property, consisting of a brewery, &c. at Horsey, to pay two legatees of 12,000l. each charged thereon by the testator, in favour of his two daughters, in case the personal estate should be deficient, which proved to be the case. But one object of the suit was, to charge the executors, Adams and Marsh, with a breach of trust, in which, however, the plaintiffs were not successful; but if they had been, or should an appeal be so, then there would be sufficient personality (to be made good by the executors) to pay the legacies in question, and the sale of the realty would be unnecessary; and it was alleged, a sale would be very injurious to William Wyatt, the devisee thereof. An appeal from the decree on all the points is now pending before the House of Lords: but William Wyatt was not originally a party to the appeal, and, therefore, his application on a former day (see 6 Law T. 155) to stay proceedings as to the sale, till the result of the appeal should be known, was refused. Since that time, however, he presented a petition of appeal to the Lords, and now renewed his application.

Wray, for the motion, said, that the Master had found that the executors might, without wilful default, have raised the legacies out of the personality, but exceptions had been taken to the report, and were held to be valid, and the case was now on appeal to the House of Lords. Mr. William Wyatt was not originally an appealing party, because the point as to the sale, or the necessity of it, was involved in the other questions; but he was now an appealing party, and renewed his application for a stay of proceedings. If the appeal should be successful, the executors would be liable for a much larger sum than 24,000*l.* and, of course, the sale of this devised estate would, therefore, be unnecessary, and much loss would be saved to him. [THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—Would not you be recompensed by the executors?] Yes, but the sale, in itself a loss, would not be prevented. [THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—Yes, but he would not be ruined. The plaintiffs are entitled by the decree to be paid their legacies in priority to you, because the real estate is charged; and for the mere chance of avoiding a sale, you seek this delay.] There is a receiver on the estate, and there can be no such need of haste.

Turner, for the plaintiffs, here intimated, that being all members of the same family, the plaintiffs would not press their opposition to the motion.

Kindersley and Roll, for the defendants, the executors.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I have nothing to say in opposition to any arrangement the parties may consent to. The case is this: the legacies are to be raised out of the personal estate, and if there is enough for the purpose, the real estate ought not to be sold. The personal estate cannot be got or realized, and, therefore, the Court may resort to the real estate specifically charged, though an appeal from the decree is pending, which may render the sale unnecessary; but the legacies cannot be delayed if they insist upon their rights. But here the plaintiffs, being members of the same family, do not press, and, therefore, the sale may be suspended; but every thing else directed by the decree must proceed.

TAPRELL v. TAYLOR.

Practice—Suing in formâ pauperis—Discharging common order.

Quare, whether a plaintiff who is in possession of a house and premises, the subject-matter of the suit, and who has obtained the common order to sue in formâ pauperis, can be dispaupered.

This was a suit instituted by the plaintiff to enforce specific performance of a lease of a house which he had built, on an alleged agreement by the defendant to grant him a lease upon his so doing. The defendant being unwilling to grant the lease, or, at least, not having granted it, the bill was filed to compel him, the plaintiff having obtained the common order to sue in formâ pauperis. The plaintiff now applied to discharge the order so obtained.

Willcock, for the motion, insisted that the order ought to be discharged on two grounds: first, that the plaintiff was in possession of the house, the subject-matter of the suit, the house being of considerable value; and, secondly, that the plaintiff, independently of this, was not in circumstances such as to entitle him to the order. The house was built, and was of the value of 140*l.* or 150*l.* He was in possession under an agreement to pay 5*l.* 5*s.* ground-rent, the house being worth 10*l.* rent over and above that sum. Besides, he let lodgings, and was a joiner, able to earn, and did earn, 2*l.* or 3*l.* a week; and possessed a chest of tools of the value of 40*l.* or 50*l.* and had regular employment. The plaintiff to the suit had put in affidavits denying this, though he admitted that he allowed his brother to remain in the house without any compensation. He said the house itself was merely a shell, and that there was no flooring. But an indifferent witness swore that there was a floor laid down, but it was not nailed. He cited Spenser v. Briant, 11 Ves. 49.

E. Montagu, for the plaintiff, said the house might be worth the money stated if a lease were granted, but it was not so without it. As to the circumstances of the plaintiff, they were, according to the affidavits, such as are consistent only with abject poverty. In Allan v. Macpherson, 5 Beav. 469, the plaintiff was entitled to the money, the subject of the suit, and he was not dispaupered. He cited Perry v. Walker, 1 Y. & C. C. 676.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The only embarrassing matter is the possession of the property. It is in vain to say he gave lodging to his brother for nothing. That might be sold for something, and it is money's worth. You have not proved you could not make any thing of it.

Montague proposed that it should stand over with a view to an arrangement; and this was, after some discussion, agreed to.

Costs—Taxation—Discharging common order.

Willcock applied, in this case, for an order to discharge the common order to tax the bill of Thomas William Davis, a solicitor employed by the East and West Junction Railway Company. It appeared that Mr. Davis was the local solicitor of the company, and had been active in getting it up, and that the town agents and solicitors of the company had obtained the common order to tax his bill of costs, though there was no connection whatever between the parties.

Shapter, on the other side, had no instructions. The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—There is no need of argument. Discharge the order.

Re FORTH MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.
Stat. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, ss. 20, 22—Bankrupt company—Winding-up.

This was an application, by petition, under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, ss. 20, 22, for the aid of the Court. The company had become bankrupt, and the object of the petition, which was by the assignees, was to obtain an order for taking the accounts and winding-up the affairs of the company, and for assessing the contributions to be paid by each member to make up the deficit. After much discussion, the case stood over for further evidence; but it is important as being about the first application to the Court on the Act.

WARD v. KEY.

Patent—Infringement—Injunction—Practice.

A defendant does not prejudice his case by not appearing on a motion for an injunction to restrain him in the infringement of a patent, provided he defends himself in the subsequent proceedings; and if he questions the validity of the plaintiff's title even at the hearing, though he may not have done so on the motion for the injunction, and no issue was then directed, yet the Court will not retain the injunction without directing the plaintiff to establish his right at law before it grants him further relief.

The plaintiff in this suit, who is a musical instrument maker, had turned his attention to the tuning of drums and improvements in the mode of stretching drum-heads, and more particularly kettle-drums, which are used in cavalry bands, where the ordinary mode of straining the heads was found to be a great inconvenience, and considering he had invented a mode of softening the tone of drums in general by perforating numerous holes in the sides thereof instead of one hole, and also that he had invented an improved mode of tightening the heads of drums by means of internal machinery, which was worked by means of a screw from a handle on the outside, instead of the old plan by cords and straps on the outside, he took out a patent in the year 1837 to secure to himself the exclusive benefit of such improvements.

The defendant, who is also a musical instrument maker, residing at Charing-cross, was discovered by the plaintiff to have manufactured drums upon the principle and according to the same plan as the plaintiff had set out in the specification of his patent, and sold drums so made to several regiments without the permission of the plaintiff, whereupon he filed the present bill in the year 1843 to restrain the defendant from making and selling kettle-drums for the use of cavalry bands in the manner which the plaintiff alleged was an infringement of his patent, and also for an account of the profits received by the defendant from the sale of drums manufactured in the manner described in the plaintiff's specification lodged for his patent. The plaintiff served the defendant with notice of an application for an injunction, the defendant did not appear upon the motion being made, and an injunction was granted; but in drawing up the order, it omitted, by some mistake, to direct an issue to try the fact of infringement.

The defendant submitted to the injunction, and never moved to have it dissolved.

The plaintiff now moved to have the other relief prayed for by his bill, without being put to establish his right at law.

Romilly and Roll appeared for the plaintiff.

Wood and Hetherington, for the defendant, insisted there was no damage done to the plaintiff by the defendant; that the plaintiff had not produced a single instrument made by the defendant to satisfy the Court that an infringement had been made; they had only produced instruments of their own to explain the nature of the improvement the plaintiff had taken out a patent for. There was no novelty in this manner of straining drums as set out in the plaintiff's specification; the principle was well known to the trade; the only useful part of the machinery was the screw, and that had been used by other musical instrument makers before and since the plaintiff had taken out his patent; that so far from the increased number of holes being beneficial, they were known to have quite a contrary effect, for they admitted damp air, which affected the head of the drum injuriously; and that even this was not new, for it had long before been tried and abandoned, and they read evidence in proof; and contended that as some of the supposed improvements set out in the specification were useless, that nullified the patent; and cited Morgan v. Scamard, Webster's Patent Cases, 196; 2 Meeson & Welsby, 544; Levis v. Marling, 10 Barn. & Cress. 22; they therefore contended that the only question which remained to be considered was, whether there should be an order directing an issue, or whether the bill should, upon the evidence produced, be dismissed with costs. At all events, it was clear that the plaintiff ought to establish his right at law before he got the relief he prayed in equity.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The defendant in this case did not appear to oppose the motion for the injunction, although he had notice of it. Whether the order then made was regular or not, in having omitted to direct the plaintiff to try his right at law, I shall give no opinion; if it was erroneous, it was so by the neglect of the Court, and should not be made to operate injuriously against the interest of the defendant, because he did not appear upon the motion and protect his rights. I quite agree with the counsel for the defendant, that a defendant is not bound to set a plaintiff right when he takes a wrong course, and that he is quite in time if he seeks the protection of the Court when that course is likely to be prejudicial to his interest. In this case, although the defendant submitted to the order of the Court granting this injunction, without appearing, yet, when the cause is brought on for hearing, he appeared, examined witnesses, and defended the suit. This cannot be said to be a case of a defendant allowing the plaintiff to proceed, and make what he could of his case, and then taking an objection to some irregularity which the Court had improvidently committed; the plaintiff is therefore bound, notwithstanding, to prove his case at the hearing to the satisfaction of the Court, precisely the same as if no such irregularity had occurred. In this case much evidence has been read on both sides to support and defeat the validity of this patent. The course the Court pursues in applications of this kind is this: where a person has obtained a patent, and had an exclusive enjoyment under it, the Court will give so much credit to his apparent right as to interpose immediately by injunction to restrain the invasion of it, and continue that interposition until the apparent right has been displaced. On the other hand, if a person takes out a patent for an invention, and is unable to support it, except upon the ground of some alleged improvement in the mode of applying that which was previously in use, and it so becomes a serious question both in point of law and of fact whether the patent is not altogether invalid, then, upon an application to this Court for what may be called the extra relief which it affords upon a prima facie case, the Court will use its discretion, and if it sees sufficient ground for doubt, will either dissolve the injunction absolutely, or direct an issue, or direct the party applying to bring an action; after the trial of which, either he may apply to revive, if successful, or else the other party may come before the Court and say, "I have been successful in displacing this patent, and am entitled to have my costs, by being brought here upon an allegation of right which cannot be supported." I think this is not one of those cases in which the plaintiff has so proved his case at the hearing that the Court would decree a perpetual injunction without putting him to try his rights at law. There is sufficient evidence for protecting the plaintiff's title subject to that, and then it remains to be considered whether the Court should deal with this case as Lord Cottenham did in Bacon v. Jones (4 Mylne & Craig, 433),—that is, dismiss the bill with costs, leaving the plaintiff to his remedy at law,—or whether I should retain the bill, giving the plaintiff liberty to bring an action. The defendant, in this case, had notice of the motion for an injunction to restrain him from doing what the plaintiff insisted was an infringement of his patent, and did not appear; and since the injunction has been granted, he has ceased to do the acts complained of, and permitted the injunction to continue. Under these circumstances, I do not think I should be dealing too hardly with the defendant if I retained this bill, and give the plaintiff an opportunity of trying his right at law, if he thinks fit. I shall resume the question of costs.

GERRARD v. LORD DINORBEN.

Practice—Simple contract debt—Interest—Voluntary bond—46th Order of 26th Aug. 1841.

A creditor under a voluntary bond, established before the Master in an administration suit, is entitled to be paid his debt before a simple contract creditor, whose debt does not carry interest, receives interest upon his debt, under the 46th Order of 26th Aug. 1841.

This was a suit for the administration of the estate of the late Duke of Sussex. The creditors had proved their debts, and all specialty debts had been paid, with interest, and all simple contract debts bearing interest had been paid, with interest; and next, all the simple contract debts not bearing interest had been paid, and there was still a large surplus, and more than sufficient to pay the costs of the suit. Amongst the proofs before the Master was a bond debt executed by the testator, without consideration, to Mademoiselle D'Este, for 10,000*l.*; finding there was a surplus, she applied to have it paid to her in liquidation of the bond debt she had proved; on the other hand, the creditors by simple contract, who had not received interest, insisted that they were entitled to priority, under the 46th Rule of the 26th of August, 1841, whereby it is declared, "that a creditor whose debt does not carry interest, who shall come in and establish the same before the Master under a decree or order in a suit, shall be entitled to interest upon his debt, at the rate of 4l. per cent. from the date of the decree, out of any assets which may remain, after satisfying the costs of the suit, the debts established, and the interest of such debts as by law carry interest."

Russell appeared for the creditors, and contended that persons claiming under voluntary instruments were not creditors at all in the consideration of creditors for valuable consideration; that they only held a position superior to legatees in the administration of an estate; and that until these creditors had been paid interest upon their debts, which the Court clearly recognized them entitled to in making this order, no person claiming under a mere voluntary instrument could receive any portion of this residue.

Tinney, for Mademoiselle D'Este, contended that this voluntary bond must be clearly recognized as a debt; it had been proved and admitted as such by the Master, and the order relied upon by the other side expressly recognizes the payment of all debts established, before interest shall be paid on debts by simple contract not bearing interest. This surplus was, therefore, clearly applicable to the payment of the debt due upon this voluntary bond.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR. — A voluntary bond clearly creates a debt, and though it does not hold priority over debts for a valuable consideration, it may be enforced in the usual order of administration against the estate of a testator. The bond in question has been established before the Master, and it is, therefore, a debt which the Court is bound to recognize. All claims upon this estate which hold priority to this debt have been satisfied, and there being a surplus, the obligee of this bond has put in her claim for payment; this is resisted by the creditors by simple contract, who have not received interest on their debts, and they support their right under the order which has been cited; they have been paid all they bargained for with the testator, and the order mentioned does not contemplate the payment of any interest, which the creditor had not secured, until all the debts established in the cause have been satisfied. The debt under this bond has been established before the Master; it must, therefore, be paid before these simple contract creditors can become entitled to have the surplus of this estate applied in the manner directed by Lord Cottenham's Order of August 1841.

REG. v. THE INHABITANTS OF MOLESWORTH.
Caption of examinations taken in support of an order of removal.

The captions of examinations taken upon an application for an order of removal did not contain a statement that they were taken upon the complaint of the churchwardens and overseers of the parish applying for the order; they were held insufficient, and the order quashed on that ground.

Semble, per Patteson, J. that an order reciting a complaint "by T. G. on behalf of the churchwardens and overseers" of the removing parish is bad.

Upon appeal against an order of two justices for the removal of Isabella Mantle and her four children from the parish of Bythorn to the parish of Molesworth, both in the County of Huntingdon, the Court of Quarter Sessions confirmed the order, subject to the opinion of this Court, upon a case; which set out, first, a complaint of chargeability, purporting to have been made "by Thomas George, one of the overseers of Bythorn on behalf of the churchwardens and overseers of Bythorn;" and, secondly, the order of justices reciting that "complaint hath been made unto us whose names are hereunto set, and seals affixed, &c. by Thomas George, on behalf of the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish of Bythorn; that, &c." Thomas George was one of the overseers of Bythorn at the time the complaint was made; and it was made by him with the sanction and authority, and at the request and on behalf of the churchwardens and overseers of that parish. The captions of all the examinations were in the following form:—

"Huntingdonshire to wit.—The examination of Isabella Mantle, &c. taken on oath this 22nd day of March, 1845, before us, two of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county, touching the place of the last legal settlement of Isabella Mantle and her four children, &c."

At the trial of the appeal it was objected that the order was bad for not shewing a complaint by the churchwardens and overseers of the removing parish, and because it did not appear from the captions of the examinations that they were taken upon the complaint of the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish of Bythorn.

Burcham, in support of the order of Sessions.—Neither of these objections can be sustained: as to the first, the order recites a complaint by Thomas George on behalf of the parish officers, and the case finds that he was one of them, and authorized by the rest. But it is not necessary that that should appear upon the order; it is not disputed that one of the parish officers may make the complaint as agent for the rest; and if the principle of agency is admissible at all, it cannot matter whether the agent be a parish officer or not; his right to make the complaint depends upon his character of agent, not of parish officer. [PATTESON, J.—But for all that appears here, Mr. George may have been a volunteer in the matter.] The case finds the contrary. The other objection to the caption of the examinations is, that they do not appear to have been taken on the complaint of the parish officers; but they are stated to be taken "touching the settlement of the paupers;" and a complaint of the parish officers must be presumed.

Wortledge, contra, was not heard.

Lord DENMAN, C. J.—The last objection is fatal. Every objection would be cured by the answer which is given to this; that as justices would do wrong if they acted without jurisdiction, it is to be presumed that they had it.

PATTESON, and WILLIAMS, JJ. concurring,
Rule absolute to quash the order of sessions.

SMART v. SANDARS.

A factor having goods of a principal in his possession for sale becomes under advances to the principal and requires payment. Meanwhile he sells a portion of the goods at a particular price, and thereupon the principal gives him notice not to sell any more at a lower price than a given sum, which is higher than that at which the first portion was sold:—Held, that the factor is not justified, after a reasonable time for payment of his advances has elapsed, in selling at a lower price than that specified in the notice given him with a view to recovering his advances; but that he is liable to an action at the suit of the principal for so doing.

This was an action of assumpsit. The plaintiff declared that, whereas the defendant was and is a corn-factor at Liverpool, and heretofore, to wit, &c. in consideration that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, had consigned and delivered to him, as such factor, a cargo consisting of 8,000 bushels of wheat to be sold and disposed of by the defendant as such factor, for and on account of the plaintiff, for a reasonable commission and reward to be paid by the plaintiff to the defendant in that behalf; the defendant promised to obey and observe the lawful orders and directions of the plaintiff to be given by him to the defendant in regard to the sale and disposal of the wheat. Averment, that the defendant afterwards sold and disposed of a small portion of the cargo at 6s. 4d. per bushel, and that the plaintiff thereupon gave him notice and ordered him not to sell any more at less than 7s. a bushel. Breach, that although, &c. yet the defendant sold the same at lower prices. There was also a second count in the same form respecting another cargo.

Pleas to the first count. 3. That after the cargo of wheat had been so consigned to the defendant as such factor, and before the committing of the alleged breach of promise, the defendant, as such factor, became and was under advances to the plaintiff in respect of the said consignment of the said cargo of wheat to a larger amount than the value of the said cargo, to wit, &c. and which said sum so advanced to the plaintiff by the defendant was then due and payable, &c. and which advances the defendant had come under by reason of having accepted divers bills of exchange for the plaintiff, and at his request against and on the security of the said cargo in the said first count mentioned before the giving of any of the orders in the first count mentioned; and that afterwards, and before the committing of the said breach of promise, the defendant gave notice to the plaintiff that he required the same sum of money so advanced by him as such factor to be repaid, and that if the plaintiff did not repay him, he should sell the whole of the residue of the said wheat, and out of the money produced by such sale should repay himself the money advanced; that a reasonable time for the repayment elapsed, but that the plaintiff did not repay the advances; that for the purpose of repaying the said sum of money so advanced, it was absolutely necessary for the defendant to sell the whole of the residue of the said wheat; and that therefore for the purpose of reimbursing and repaying to himself the sum advanced, he sold the residue of the wheat for the prices in the said first count mentioned, the same being the best prices he could obtain for the said cargo of wheat, and that the proceeds were not sufficient to repay him the whole of the money advanced.

4. That the plaintiff was indebted to the defendant for advances on other consignments, and that he had a lien on the wheat in question for such advances, and a right to have them repaid out of the proceeds of the wheat. The plea then went on to state the nonpayment and the sale of the wheat, as in plea 3. There were similar pleas to the second count, and a special demurrer to each. Among the grounds of demurrer assigned to each were, that the plea was an argumentative traverse of the promise; that it was bad as amounting to the general issue; that in answer to the averment in the declaration that the defendant promised to obey the lawful orders of the plaintiff, the defendant professed to shew that he only promised to obey such orders as should not be inconsistent with the right claimed to sell in order to repay the advances; that it was uncertain whether the defendant meant to admit or to deny the promise; that if the defendant meant to insist that the advances gave him a subsequent authority to disobey the plaintiff's orders, such authority should have been pleaded as the result of an express agreement, and ought not to have been left as an inference of law, &c.

Channell, Serjt. (with him Taprell), for the plaintiff.

July 6.—COLTMAN, J.(a) delivered the judgment of the Court.

JUDGMENT.

In the argument upon this demurrer several objections in point of form were urged against the plea, and also that it was bad in substance, which of course is the most important question. In order to answer that, let us first inquire what are the relative positions of a principal and a factor for sale. From the mere relation of principal and factor, the latter derives authority to sell at such time, and for such prices, as he may in the exercise of his discretion think best for his employer; but if he receives the goods subject to any special instructions, he is bound to obey them, and the authority, whether general or special, is binding. This was not denied, but on the behalf of the defendant it was contended, that where a factor has advanced money on goods consigned to him for sale, the authority to sell is irrevocable, because it would be coupled with an interest. That may be true; but it was incumbent on the defendant to maintain also, that on the failure of the principal to repay such advances within a reasonable time after demand, the authority of the factor is enlarged, and that he has an absolute right to sell at any time for the best price that can be obtained, without regard to the interests of the principal, and without regard to the nature of the authority originally given to him. No case was cited in which this point appears to have been decided in any English court. In Warner v. M'Kay, 1 M. & W. 591, it was incidentally mentioned, and as far as any opinion of the judges can be collected from the report, it would seem that Parke, B. thought that a factor might sell to repay himself advances, and that Lord Abinger, C.J. was of a different opinion; and certainly there is nothing there said that can be treated as an authority for our guidance in this case. But we were referred to a passage in Story's Law of Agency. In the chapter "On the right of lien of agents" (ch. 14, § 371), he says, "In certain cases, where he has made advances as a factor, it would seem to be clear that he may sell to repay those advances without the assent of the owner (inuito domino), if the latter, after due notice of his intention to sell for the advances, does not repay him the amount." For this is cited a decision of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, which refers to the case of Pothonier v. Dawson, Holt, N.P. 383. The latter was not an instance of goods placed in the hands of a factor for sale, but of a party in whose hands goods were deposited to secure the repayment at the time agreed upon of the money lent; in which case Gibbs, C. J. said, "Undoubtedly, as a general proposition, a right of lien gives no right to sell the goods; but when goods are deposited by way of security to indemnify a party against a loan of money, it is more than a pledge. The lender's rights are more extensive than such as accrue under an ordinary lien in the way of trade." And he proceeds to say that, "from the nature of the transaction, it might be inferred that the contract was that if the borrower failed to repay the money, the lender might sell to repay himself." We were also referred to Story on Bailments, ch. v. "On Pawns or Pledges," s. 308, where the rule of law is said to be, that if a pledge is not redeemed within the stipulated time by a due performance of the contract, the pawnee may sell it in order to have his debt or indemnity. But the relation of principal and factor, where money is advanced on goods consigned for sale, is not that of pawnee and pawnee, as they are delivered for sale on account of, and for the benefit of, the principal, not by way of security or indemnity against the loan, though they operate as such, the factor having a lien upon them and upon their proceeds, when sold to the amount of the claim against the principal. The authority of factors, whether general or special, may become irrevocable where advances have been made; but there is nothing in this transaction from which, to adopt the language of Gibbs, C.J. such a contract can be inferred, and the defendant was bound to prove the contract, if at any time the goods were to be forfeited, or the authority to sell enlarged, so as to enable the factor to sell at any time for the repayment of the advances, without reference to its being for the interest of the principal to sell at that time, and for that price. Nor can we find any principle in the law by which, independently of the contract, such authority is given. On these grounds it appears to us the plea is bad in substance. It is unnecessary to consider whether the authority thus supposed to be given to the factor is to be construed as an enlargement of his original authority, by the same rule of law; or as arising from some implied condition annexed to the original contract. In either case it would be very doubtful whether they should not be treated as identical. The contract laid in the plea, therefore, sets up a defence which amounts to the general issue. For the reasons we have above given, we think the third plea is bad, and the other special pleas are open to the same objection; and our judgment must be for the plaintiff.

HAYWARD v. BENNETT.

To an action upon a bond given under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 8, conditioned for the render of H. H. to the custody of the gaoler of the court in which the action should be brought, within such time and in such manner as that Court should direct, the defendant pleaded, that the action was brought in the Queen's Bench, judgment recovered, and that, according to the practice of the said Court, the plaintiff caused to be issued a ca. sa.; that according to the practice of the Court, the ca. sa. was delivered to the sheriff, and that before any breach of the condition H. H. was arrested under the writ; that afterwards H. H. sued out a habeas corpus, that the sheriffs thereupon brought him before one of the judges of the Queen's Bench, who committed him to the custody of the Marshal of the Marshalsea, of all which the plaintiff had notice; that H. H. was always ready to render himself, but was prevented in manner aforesaid. Held, that the plea was bad.

This was an action of debt on a bond. The plea which was demurred to, and the arguments appear fully in the judgment.

JUDGMENT.

This was an action of debt on a bond entered into in pursuance of the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 8. The defendant prayedoyer of the bond. The condition was, after reciting that James Hayward, the plaintiff in this action, had made an affidavit, stating, that Henry Haines was indebted to him in the sum of 681l. 15s. that if Henry Haines did and should pay to James Hayward such sums of money as should be recovered against the said Henry Haines and John Heffer, or against the said Henry Haines, in any action which had been brought, or should thereafter be brought, for the recovery of the said alleged debt of 681l. 15s. or should render himself into the custody of the gaoler of the court in which such action should have been, or might be, brought for recovery of the said alleged debt, within such time and in such manner as the said Court, or any judge thereof, should direct, then the said bond or obligation should be void, or otherwise to be and remain of full force and effect. The defendant pleaded, in substance, that after the making of the said writing obligatory, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, &c. the plaintiff brought an action in the Court of Queen's Bench against John Heffer and Henry Haines for the recovery of the said alleged debt, and that the plaintiff afterwards recovered against the said J. H. and H. H. the sum of 924l. 1s. as well in respect of the said debt, as for his costs and charges, &c. The defendant further said, that afterwards, and before the commencement of this suit, and according to the practice of the said Court, to wit, on the 29th of October, 1842, the plaintiff caused to be issued out of the Court of Queen's Bench, upon the said judgment so recovered by him as aforesaid, a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum against the said J. H. and H. H. directed to the sheriffs of London, whereby the Queen commanded the said sheriffs to take the said J. H.

and H. H. and them safely keep, so that the said sheriffs might have the bodies of the said J. H. and H. H. before the Queen herself at Westminster, on Tuesday, the 15th day of November next ensuing, to satisfy the said plaintiff the said sum of 924l. 1s. together with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. from the 30th day of June, 1842; and the sheriffs were commanded to have them then and there. The defendant further said, that afterwards, and according to the practice of the Court, the said writ was delivered to the said sheriffs; and afterwards, and before the return day, to wit, on the 15th day of November therein mentioned, and before any breach of the said condition, and before the time of the said Henry Haines surrendering himself according to the practice of the said Court had expired, and within a reasonable time before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on the 14th of November, 1842, the said Henry Haines, being within the bailiwick of the said sheriffs, was, according to the practice of the said Court, taken and arrested under the said writ, and surrendered himself thereto, and was kept in the custody of the said sheriffs, by virtue of the said writ. And the defendant further said that afterwards, and before any breach of the said condition, and before the commencement of this suit, and while the said Henry Haines remained in the custody of the said sheriffs in execution under the said writ, and the said judgment, and within a reasonable time after, &c. to wit, &c. the said Henry Haines caused to be issued out of the said Court of Queen's Bench, according to the practice of the said Court, a writ of habeas corpus cum causa, whereby the sheriffs were commanded to have the body of the said Henry Haines before the Lord Chief Justice of the said Court, to do and receive &c. And the defendant further said that the said writ afterwards, and before the commencement of this suit, and according to the practice of the said Court, was delivered to the said sheriffs, and under and by virtue of the said writ such sheriffs immediately, and within a reasonable time afterwards, to wit, &c. according to the practice of the said Court, brought the said Henry Haines before the Honourable Sir John Patteson, Knight, one of her Majesty's justices of the said Court, who then, according to the practice of the said Court, received from the said sheriffs the body of the said Henry Haines, who then, before any breach of the said condition, and before the time of the said Henry Haines surrendering himself according to the practice of the said Court had expired, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, &c. according to the practice of the said Court, committed the said Henry Haines into the custody of the marshal of the Marshalsea, Thomas Chapman, esq. the marshal, then being the gaoler of her Majesty's said Court, and the said marshal then received, and kept, and confined the said Henry Haines under and by virtue of that committal and execution, and at the suit of the plaintiff upon the said judgment, according to the practice of the said Court, until and after the return day of the said writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, to wit, &c. of all of which the plaintiff had notice. And the defendant further said that after the commitment of the said Henry Haines as aforesaid, and before the commencement of this suit, to wit, &c. the said sheriffs made their return to the said writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, and thereby returned that they had taken the said Henry Haines and kept him until they had received the said writ of habeas corpus cum causa, and further returned the commitment of the said Henry Haines. And the defendant further said, that from the time of the recovery of the said judgment, until the said Henry Haines was taken and arrested under the said writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, he the said Henry Haines was always ready and willing to render himself into the custody of the gaoler of the said Court, according to the practice of the said Court, and afterwards, and whilst he was and remained in custody as aforesaid, he was ready and willing so to render himself and would have rendered himself accordingly, but he was prevented by the plaintiff from so doing in manner aforesaid, and which last-mentioned premises the plaintiff well knew. To this plea the plaintiff demurred specially, on the ground that it purports in one part to shew the condition of the writing obligatory to be performed by the said Henry Haines, and in another part sets up matter of excuse; and that if the plea is to be taken as shewing that Henry Haines had rendered himself in compliance with the said condition, it was bad as not stating distinctly that he did render himself according to the practice of the Court, but if as setting up matter of excuse for not rendering according to the condition, then that it did not shew any sufficient excuse, or any answer to the action. We think it clear that this plea is to be looked at as a plea of performance, and that it is defective on the ground already stated on demurrer. We cannot in this court take notice of the practice of the Court of Queen's Bench. If the matters pleaded do constitute a tender according to the practice of that court that ought to be a matter of averment. But on the part of the defendant it was contended that the plea should be considered as setting up a certain tender according to the practice of the Court. It may be admitted as clear law that if there is an obligation defensible on the performance of a certain condition, and the condition becomes impossible by the act of the obligee, the obligor should be excused from performance (Co. Littleton, 266, a.) But it does not appear to us that the defendant in this case has shewn the existence of any such impossibility. The act relied upon for that purpose is the suing out the capias ad satisfaciendum, and the delivering of it to the sheriffs; from which it was intended that the Court should infer that it was impossible that the said Henry Haines should surrender himself into the custody of the marshal according to the practice of the Court of Queen's Bench. If any such impossibility did in fact exist, it should have been averred distinctly, so that a certain and definite issue might be taken upon it. Instead of taking such a proceeding, the defendant says, that the said Henry Haines would have rendered himself, but was prevented by the plaintiff as aforesaid; or, in other words, was prevented by the plaintiff suing out the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, which this Court cannot judicially know is any impediment whatever to the writ. We therefore think that the plea is bad, and there must be judgment for the plaintiff thereupon.

Judgment accordingly.

Wednesday, June 24.

BOOTH v. MILLNE.

The rule laid down in Cripps v. Wells, Car. & Marsh. 489, as to the right to begin, is the correct rule. Where the judge is wrong in his ruling as to the right to begin, the Court will not necessarily grant a new trial, unless it appear that the mistake of the judge occasioned clear and manifest wrong to the party who was properly entitled to begin.

In this case, Martin, Q.C. shewed cause against the rule for a new trial obtained by Pashley in last Easter Term (April 22), on the ground that the learned judge at the trial was mistaken in his ruling as to the right to begin, and that the defendant was entitled so to do.

Pashley was heard in support of his rule, and in the course of the argument, which it is not thought necessary to give at length, the following cases were cited: Cripps v. Wells, Car. & M. 489; Smart v. Rayner, 6 C. & P. 721; Mercer v. Whell, 5 Q.B. 447.

By the COURT.—In this case the plaintiff was entitled to begin, and the ruling of Rolfe, B. in Cripps v. Wells was correct. There the plaintiff (as indorsee) declared on three promissory notes against the defendant, who was the drawer. The declaration contained counts on the notes only, without any other count; the defendant pleaded, as to part of the amount, payment of that sum while the payee was the holder of the notes, and as to the residue, payment into Court, and that plaintiff had sustained no greater damages. The plaintiff replied to the first plea, that the payment was not made while the payee was the holder of the notes; and to the second plea, that the plaintiff had sustained greater damages. The learned judge held, that although if the first issue had stood alone, the defendant would have been entitled to begin; yet that the second issue entitled the plaintiff to begin, notwithstanding a statement by the defendant's counsel, that if the defendant succeeded on the first issue, the plaintiff, as matter of calculation, could not be entitled to say anything on the second issue. We should mention, that the report of what fell from Lord Abinger in Blackman v. Fernie, 2 Jurist, 444, 446, is incorrect; the Lord Chief Baron did not (according to the recollection of Mr. Baron Parke) say that the Court would have interfered to rectify the error, "if the Lord Chief Justice had been decidedly wrong" in his ruling as to his right to begin; but if such ruling had been clear and manifest wrong, the rule in this case must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

PILKINGTON v. SCOTT.

Certain persons agreed to enter into the service of the plaintiffs as workmen and servants in their business for seven years, at stipulated wages. In case of desertion in the trade carried on by the plaintiffs, the plaintiff were to be at liberty to give notice that they should not employ the said workmen, in which case the wages during the period of non-employment were to be calculated at one moiety of those paid during the week preceding the notice, the masters being likewise at liberty in case of sickness to employ other hands, and to dismiss the workmen, parties to the agreement, on giving one month's notice of their intention so to do. The workmen on their parts agreed not, during the said period of seven years, to enter into the employ of any parties except the plaintiffs, but the agreement did not contain any express promise by the plaintiffs to employ the said workmen.—Held, that this agreement was not void, as being unreasonably in restraint of trade; that there was some consideration for the agreement by the servants; and that according to the case of Hitchcock v. Coker, 6 A. & E. 438, the Court could not therefore inquire into the adequacy of such consideration.

This was an action brought against the defendant for wrongfully detaining the servants of the plaintiffs. To the declaration, the pleas were Not Guilty, and others which it is not material to specify. It appeared at the trial that an agreement had been entered into between the plaintiffs and certain persons who proposed to enter into their service as workmen, in the business carried on by the plaintiffs. By this agreement, the parties contracted to work exclusively for the plaintiffs at certain wages for seven years, the plaintiffs, on giving due notice, to be at liberty, in case of any depression in the business by them carried on, to discontinue employing the workmen with whom the agreement was entered into on certain terms therein specified, viz. that the wages were, during the period of non-employment, to be calculated at one moiety of those paid during the week preceding the date of the notice, the plaintiffs likewise to be at liberty in case of sickness to employ other persons in lieu of those contracted with, and to be empowered to dismiss the parties to the contract altogether, on giving one month's notice of their intention so to do. The agreement did not contain any express undertaking, or promise, on the part of the plaintiffs, to employ the said workmen in their business. Martin, Q.C. and Crompton, now showed cause against the rule for a new trial, obtained April 21, by Knowles, Q.C. (see Law T. for April 27). They argued that this was not a contract in restraint of trade, and cited Hitchcock v. Coker, 6 A. & E. 438, as shewing that where the restraint is neither unreasonable nor oppressive, and where there is some consideration for the contract between the parties, the Court will not enter into the question, whether the consideration was equal in value to the restraint agreed to by the party to whom that consideration moved.

J. Henderson, in support of the rule.—A contract by A. to work for B. for seven years, in consideration of 100*l.* is good; but a contract by A. not to work for any person except B. during seven years, in consideration of 100*l.* but without any contract on the part of B. to employ him, would be bad. The case last put is similar to the present; besides, here the restraint was unreasonable, and against public policy. Hitchcock v. Coker only decided that as between the parties themselves, the adequacy of the consideration could not be considered; but with reference to the public, it is submitted, that it may be inquired into. He cited Mellan v. May, 11 M. & W. 663; Ward v. Byrne, 6 M. & W. 548; Aspin v. Austin, 5 Q.B. 671; Dunn v. Sayles, 5 Q.B. 685; Young v. Timmins, 1 Cr. & J. 331.

ALDERSON, B.—There is no doubt that where a contract is unreasonably in restraint of trade, it is void; and according to Hitchcock v. Coker, even where the restraint is not unreasonable, there must be some consideration for the contract; but if there appear to have been some consideration, the Court will not inquire what that consideration was; whereas, previously to this case, it was thought that the adequacy of the consideration might be inquired into. In the present case, it appears to me that the agreement was not unreasonably in restraint of trade, that there was some consideration for it, and that Hitchcock v. Coker consequently applies.

ROLFE and PLATT, BB. concurred.

Rule discharged.

JOWETT v. SPENCER.

By indenture between the plaintiff of the first part, J. L. of the second part, and the defendant of the third part, the said J. L. at the request and by the direction of the plaintiff, granted to the defendant all the coal mines, beds, veins, and seams of coal under a certain message and land, to hold the same to the defendant, &c. subject to the covenants therein contained; and the defendant, by the indenture, covenanted to pay to the plaintiff, as the price and consideration money for the coal so granted, 40*l.* for every statute acre which should be found under such message and land, until the said price and consideration for the coal should be fully paid. The defendant covenanted to pay the plaintiff 40*l.* part of the said consideration money, in each year, in two equal instalments, one, &c. whether the whole of an acre of the said coal should be gotten in every such year or not. In an action upon this indenture, the declaration stated, that at the time of making the said indenture there were within and under the said message and land, divers statute acres of the said coal, and that a large quantity, to wit, &c. still remained within and under the said message and land, and that a sum of money, to wit, 40*l.* for two half-yearly instalments for the coal aforesaid, became and was due, and still was in arrear and unpaid. Held, that upon this declaration the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, inasmuch as the finding of the coal was a condition precedent to the obligation to pay, and in order to shew that the defendant had become liable to pay the 40*l.* the plaintiff should have averred in his declaration that coal had been found within and under the said message and land.

This was an action of covenant on an indenture, the material parts of which will be found stated in the judgment (infra), and a verdict having been found for the plaintiff.

Addison now (June 24) showed cause against the rule obtained by Jervis, Q.C. (see the Law

T. for April 25), to arrest the judgment, on the ground that there was no averment in the declaration that coal had been found within or under the message and land in the indenture mentioned, and that such averment was necessary, inasmuch as the finding of the coal was a condition precedent to the obligation on the part of the defendant to pay the consideration agreed upon between the parties. Addison argued that the averment in the declaration that there was coal under the said land was equivalent to an express averment that coal was found there, and that the jury could not have found for the plaintiff unless this fact, viz. that coal had been found under the said land, had been proved to their satisfaction at the trial, and that by such finding the defect, if any, in the declaration was cured. He cited Stinnet v. Hogg, 1 Williams Saund. 6th edit. 28, c.

Atherton, in support of the rule, contended that there was nothing on the face of the declaration to shew that coal had ever been found under the lands in question; that the grant was in fact a grant of all existing coal, with a contract on the part of the defendant to pay at a certain rate for all that should be found; that the existence of coal and the finding of it were very different things; and that the omission in the declaration of any averment that coal had been found was fatal to the maintenance of the action. In the course of his argument, Platt, B. referred to Sicklemore v. Thistleton, 6 M. & S. 9.

Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT.

June 25.—ALDERSON, B. now gave judgment as follows:—This was a motion in arrest of judgment. The declaration stated that by indenture between the plaintiff, of the first part, J. L. of the second part, and the defendant, of the third part, the said J. L. at the request and by the direction of the plaintiff, granted to the defendant all the coal mines, beds, veins, and seams of coal under a certain message and land, to hold the same to the said defendant, &c. subject to the covenants therein contained; and that the defendant, by the said indenture, covenanted to pay unto the plaintiff, as the price and consideration money of the coal so granted, 40*l.* for every statute acre which should be found under such message and land; and until the said price and consideration money for the coal should be fully paid, that he, the defendant, would pay to the plaintiff 40*l.* part of the said consideration money, in each year in two equal instalments, on the 3rd of January and the 3rd of July, the first payment to be made on the 3rd of January next after the date of the indenture; and whether the whole of an acre of the said coal should be gotten in every such year or not. The declaration further stated, that at the time of making the said indenture, there were, within and under the said message and lands, divers statute acres of the said coal, and that a large quantity, to wit, thirteen acres of the said coal, still remained within and under the said message and lands, and that a sum of money, to wit, 40*l.* for two half-yearly instalments for the coal aforesaid, became and was due, and still was in arrear and unpaid. The defendant pleaded non est factum, and another plea not affecting the present question. On these pleas issue was joined, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the question now is, whether upon this finding the plaintiff is entitled to judgment? By the covenant, for the breach of which this action was brought, the defendant bound himself to pay 40*l.* for every statute acre of the said coal that should be found within and under the said message and land, and to pay that sum yearly, by half-yearly instalments, whether one acre of the said coal should be gotten or not. The finding of the coal is consequently, as it appears to us, a condition precedent to the obligation to pay; and in order to shew that the defendant had become liable to pay the 40*l.* the plaintiff should have averred in his declaration, that coal had been found under and within the message and land. The averment that coal was within and under the message and land is quite consistent with its never having been found. The language of the agreement is, for the annual payment of 40*l.* whether the whole of an acre of coal should be gotten or not. Such a covenant as this shews that the party to the deed intended that the word "found" should import more than the mere existence of the coal; whether it is used as synonymous with "gotten," or whether as synonymous with "in a condition to be gotten," or the ability to get the coal beyond that of its mere existence, is quite unimportant; the necessity of the averment of its having been found still remains. It was contended by the plaintiff's counsel, that after verdict and adjudication of the sum of 40*l.* for a year's rent, the averment that the rent became and still was in arrear and unpaid was sufficient to support the declaration, and that the jury must have found the verdict on the assumption that coal had been found. In Sicklemore v. Thistleton, 6 Maule & Sel. 9, the Court of Queen's Bench held that that general averment was not sufficient, even after verdict. In that case, the defendant had executed a lease of certain premises. In the declaration it was stated that the covenant was general that the lessee should pay the rent and perform the covenants to be by him paid and performed, and the breach assigned was that rent was in arrear; but the deed having been set out on oyer, the effect of which was to make it part of the declaration, it appeared that the defendant covenanted to pay on demand, in case the lessee should neglect to pay the rent forty days after it became due. The declaration did not aver the demand on the expiration of the forty days, and judgment was arrested, though the declaration was that three-quarters' arrears of rent were unpaid. The form of assigning the breach in the present declaration, by describing the money to be due as two half-yearly instalments of the price or consideration for the coal, limits it to the supposed arrears of instalments of the price of the coal, being within and under the message and land; for the breach is, that after the making of the indenture, and before the commencement of the suit, a sum of money, to wit, 40*l.* as two half-yearly instalments of the said price or consideration money for the coal within and under the said message and land, became and was due, and still was in arrear and unpaid, contrary to the tenor and effect of the defendant's covenant. This breach differs from the obligation imposed by the covenant, which was not to pay for coal still existing within and under the said message and land, but for such as should be found. We therefore think this declaration is bad, and that the judgment must be arrested.

Judgment arrested.

THE MAYOR, &c. OF SALFORD, v. ACKERS.

By the 82nd section of the local Act, 11 Geo. 4, c. 8, the commissioners appointed to carry out the provisions of that Act were, amongst other things, empowered to cause new pavements, &c. to be made at the charge of the owners or occupiers of houses, &c.; and by the 83rd section it was provided that, previously to so doing, they should give notice to such occupiers, requiring them to make such pavements; and in case any such owner or occupier should neglect or refuse so to do for the space of six calendar months, "then and in such case it should be lawful for the said commissioners, &c. to cause the same to be done, and to recover the costs, charges, and expenses thereof from such owner or occupier, in case of refusal to pay the same, in such manner as herein is mentioned." The declaration in an action brought to recover the expenses incurred by the commissioners in paving, &c. from the owner or occupier of a house within their jurisdiction did not contain any averment that notice had been given to the owner or occupier under the said 83rd section: Held, on general demurrer, that the giving the notice was a condition precedent to the right of the commissioners to maintain the action, and that it was incumbent on them to aver in the declaration that such notice had been given.

The arguments on the demurrer in this case will be found reported in the LAW TIMES for May 30. The Court, on the argument which was concluded June 1, took time to consider their judgment, which was now (June 26) delivered as follows:—

JUDGMENT.

ROLFE, B.—This was an action brought by the new corporation of Salford, as having succeeded to all the original rights and privileges of the old incorporators of that borough by the local Act of the 11 Geo. 4, c. 8. The action was brought against the defendant as the owner of land in a certain street, paved by order of the commissioners, to recover his quota for the expense of paving that street. The declaration, after reciting that this was one of the streets within the borough liable to the jurisdiction of the commissioners; and also reciting that the commissioners had, in the exercise of their power, caused that street to be paved, goes on to aver that the proportion of the expense to be paid by the defendant in respect of that land was 21*l.* and something odd. The declaration then states the charter incorporating the borough, and subsequently the local Act, under the provisions of which all the rights of the commissioners were transferred to the plaintiffs, including the right to recover the money, if any, that should be so due from the defendant; and it then avers non-payment of the above-mentioned sum of 21*l.* To this declaration the defendant demurred generally, on the ground that the Paving Act did not give any right of action to the commissioners. The plaintiffs relied on the 82nd section of the Paving Act, which enacts, that it shall be lawful for the commissioners to cause new pavements to be made, &c. in such manner as to them shall seem meet, and that the charges and expenses of such new pavement shall be paid and reimbursed by the owners and occupiers of lands adjoining the said streets, each of such owners and occupiers paying an equal share thereof. It goes on to shew how that share is to be ascertained, and enacts, that it shall be lawful for the commissioners to recover such expenses by an action at law in any of the superior courts. It was on this clause that the plaintiffs relied. The defendant, not disputing that clause, denied the right of action, and insisted that clause 83 imposes a duty on the commissioners, as a condition precedent, of first requiring the owners or occupiers to do the work themselves, and that it is only on their default and neglect to do so that the right of the commissioners arises. That section, the 83rd, begins with the words "provided always," and then proceeds to enact, that before the commissioners shall cause the streets to be paved as therein aforesaid, they shall first give notice to every owner and occupier, requiring him to pave the same in such manner as they shall direct; and that if any such owner or occupier shall for six months neglect so to do, then, and in such case, it shall be lawful for the commissioners, and they are thereby required, to cause the same to be done, and recover the expenses from such owner or occupier in such manner as therein is mentioned. On these two clauses, taken together, the defendant contends that the giving of the notice was a condition precedent, and that the declaration is bad on general demurrer, for not containing an averment that such notice had been given. We think, undoubtedly, his argument is good, and must prevail. The contention on the other side was, that inasmuch as the notice to the owners and occupiers, calling on them to do the work themselves, was the subject of a separate and subsequent clause introduced by way of proviso, non-compliance with such subsequent enactment was matter to be set up by the defendant by way of defence, and that it was not necessary for the plaintiffs to advert to it in the declaration; and it was further contended that the principle of those cases applies in which it has been held that an exception not being embodied in the enacting clause, but forming the subject of a distinct proviso, must be pleaded distinctly, and need not be stated by the party whose case rests on the words of the enacting clause. We do not question the doctrine of that class of cases, which is, however, wholly inapplicable to this. The question in this case is, taking the two clauses together, under what circumstances were the commissioners entitled to maintain an action against the owner. They were empowered to do so only when they had first given notice to the owner requiring him to do the work himself. The first clause, the 82nd, does authorize the commissioners to bring an action without in terms imposing any previous condition. But the next clause shows clearly that it is open to the owners and other parties to do the work themselves; and it enacts that in default of their doing so, then (which certainly means then only) it shall be lawful for the commissioners to recover the expense in such manner as is herein (that is to say, in the previous clause) mentioned. This makes the notice a condition precedent, without which no action can arise, and, in compliance with the general principle, it must be averred. Mr. Watson, for the plaintiffs, against this construction, pointed out the difficulty there would be in knowing to whom the notices should be given, or who the owners and occupiers were that claimed the land. No doubt there may be such difficulties, but they are difficulties that the parties who obtained the Act have brought on themselves, and cannot affect third persons. However, our decision on this demurrer is upon the short ground that we think the having given the notices is a condition precedent to the plaintiffs' right of action, and that it was incumbent on them to aver in the declaration that such notices were given; and therefore the demurrer must be allowed, and there must be judgment for the defendant.

Judgment for the defendant.

Saturday, July 4.

WALLER v. BLACKLOCK.

To a declaration in trespass, the defendant pleaded several pleas. The cause went down for trial at the assizes, and was made a remanet. Afterwards, the defendant obtained leave to withdraw one of his pleas, and to substitute another for it; and the cause was subsequently tried, when a verdict was found for the defendant, on the plea thus substituted, and for the plaintiff on the other pleas: Held, on motion to review the Master's taxation of costs, that the plaintiff was entitled to all the costs up to the period of the cause being made a remanet at the first assizes.

In this case Hoggins shewed cause, in Trinity Term last (May 22), against a rule which had been obtained by Cowling, for reviewing the Master's taxation of costs, made under the following circumstances:—The action was in trespass for destroying plaintiff's weir. The defendant pleaded several pleas, and when the cause went down to trial at the assizes, it was made a remanet. The defendant having applied for leave to withdraw one of his pleas, and to substitute another for it, this application was granted, "on payment of the costs of and occasioned by such amendment;" when the cause went down again after this amendment, a verdict was found for the defendant, on the amended plea, and for the plaintiff on the other issues; and thereupon, Master Walker allowed to the plaintiff all the costs, up to the time of the cause being made a remanet. No cases were cited in the course of the argument, which turned altogether on the above facts; and the Court, after hearing Cowling in support of his rule, took time to consider their judgment, which was now (July 4), delivered by PARKE, B. as follows:—

JUDGMENT.

This case stood over for our consideration. The question was, whether Master Walker was right in allowing the plaintiff the costs of the remanet. To the declaration the defendant pleaded several pleas. The cause went down to the assizes, and was made a remanet. Afterwards the defendant applied for leave to amend one of his pleas, and permission was given so to do. The case went down again to the subsequent assizes, when the plaintiff failed upon the substituted plea, but succeeded on the other issues; and upon taxation of costs, Master Walker allowed to the plaintiff all the costs of the remanet at the first assizes. An application was made to review his taxation, but we are clearly of opinion that Master Walker was right, and it seems to us that he was right upon this principle. The plaintiff, in order that justice might be done, with reference to the issues raised on the record at the time of the first assizes, underwent the delay of the trial at those assizes, and ought, therefore, to receive his part of the costs of those issues; that is, the costs of the delay, which are the costs of the remanet. It therefore seems to us that the rule must be discharged.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

ON ERROR FROM THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Argued Feb. 4.—Determined June 16.

Upon a policy of life insurance were indorsed certain conditions and regulations, amongst which was the following: "Every policy effected by a person on his or her own life shall be void if such person shall commit suicide, or die by duelling or the hands of justice." To a declaration on this policy, the defendants who were directors of the insurance company, pleaded that the assured did commit suicide, whereby the policy became void, and on this plea issue was joined. At the trial evidence was given that the deceased destroyed himself by having, voluntarily and for the purpose of killing himself, swallowed a quantity of sulphuric acid. The same witness also gave evidence to show that at the time of his swallowing the said sulphuric acid the deceased was of unsound mind, whereupon the learned judge told the jury that in order to find the issue for the defendants they must be satisfied that the deceased died by his own voluntary act, being then able to distinguish between right and wrong, and to appreciate the nature and quality of the act which he was doing, so as to be a responsible and moral agent.—Held (Pollock, C.B. and Wightman, J. diss.) that this direction was incorrect, that the word "suicide" must be interpreted in accordance with its ordinary meaning, and must be taken to include every act of self-destruction, provided it be the intentional act of the party, knowing at the time the probable consequences of what he is about to do.

This was an action brought to recover the amount of several policies of insurance for 999l. each on the life of one Louis Schwabe deceased, whereby the plaintiff below, the administratrix of the last will and testament of the said Louis Schwabe, sought to recover the sum insured from the defendants, James Clift and Edward Bates, who were directors of "The Argus Assurance Company," with which company the above-mentioned insurance had been effected. Upon the policy of insurance certain conditions and regulations were indorsed, to which the policy was readed therein, in like manner as if they had been inserted therein, and amongst these conditions was the following: "6th. Every policy effected by a person on his or her own life shall be void, if such person shall commit suicide, or die by duelling, or the hands of justice. But if any policy effected by a person on his or her own life shall afterwards be actually assigned to any person or persons by way of mortgage, or for the benefit of any creditor or creditors, or charged with any sum or sums for the benefit of any mortgagee or mortgagees, or creditor or creditors, and the person on whose life the assurance shall have been effected, shall commit suicide, or die by duelling, or by the hands of justice, then the policy so assigned or charged shall not be void to the extent of the principal sum or sums, and interest secured by the assignment or charge, or if any policy effected by any person on his or her own life, shall afterwards be absolutely assigned to a purchaser for valuable consideration in any transaction (except that of settlement upon or after marriage or any other occasion), and the person on whose life the assurance shall have been effected, shall commit suicide, or die by duelling, or by the hands of justice, then the policy so assigned shall continue in full force, notwithstanding such suicide or death." The declaration contained counts upon five separate policies of insurance for 999l. each, subject respectively to the condition or proviso above set forth, and the aggregate amount of which the plaintiff sought by the present action to recover. To this declaration the defendant pleaded as follows:—"That though true it is that the said several policies of insurance in the declaration mentioned were so made, and that the defendants promised as in the declaration is mentioned, and that the said Louis Schwabe died as in the declaration is alleged, yet for plea to the said declaration the defendants say, that after the making of the said several policies, and the said promises respectively, to wit, on the 10th day of January, in the year of our Lord, 1845, the said Louis Schwabe did commit suicide, whereby the said policies respectively became and were void." The plaintiff, by her replication, traversed the allegation in the plea above set forth, viz.: that the said Louis Schwabe did commit suicide, and on this traverse issue was joined. The cause came on for trial at the last Summer Assizes, before Mr. Justice Cresswell, at Liverpool, and evidence was given which shewed that the said Louis Schwabe had destroyed himself by taking sulphuric acid; evidence was likewise given that the assured was in an unsound state of mind at the time when he so destroyed himself, and the learned judge thereupon directed the jury that, in order to find the issue joined between the parties for the defendants, it was necessary that they should be satisfied that the said Louis Schwabe died by his own voluntary act, being then able to distinguish between right and wrong, and to appreciate the nature and quality of the act that he was doing, so as to be a responsible moral agent; that the burthen of proof as to his dying by his own voluntary act, was on the defendants, but that being established, the jury must assume that he was of sane mind, and a responsible moral agent, unless the contrary should appear in evidence. A verdict was accordingly found for the plaintiff below, a bill of exceptions being tendered on behalf of the defendants below, to the charge and direction of the learned judge, on the ground that the jury ought to have been directed that, "if the said Louis Schwabe, deceased, voluntarily took the said sulphuric acid for the purpose of destroying life, being conscious of the probable consequences of the act, and having at the time of so taking it sufficient mind to will to destroy life, he had committed suicide within the meaning of the said 6th condition of the said policies respectively." The points for argument before the Court of Exchequer Chamber on the part of the plaintiffs in error, were as follows: "That according to the true construction of the expression in the 6th condition of the several policies 'shall commit suicide,' if the assured by his own voluntary act, put himself to death, intending at the time of committing the act to cause his own death, and being conscious that such would be the probable effect of the means employed by him for that purpose, the condition attached, and the several policies, became forfeited; although at the time of so killing himself he might be of unsound mind, and incapable, by reason of such unsoundness, of distinguishing between right and wrong, and that the jury ought to have been directed accordingly." "The points for argument on the part of the defendant in error, were, that the direction of the learned judge was correct, and that, 'if the deceased died by his own voluntary act, being then of insane mind and unable to distinguish between right and wrong, and to appreciate the nature and quality of the act that he was doing, so as to be a responsible moral agent, he did not commit suicide avoiding the policies, according to the provisos in that behalf therein respectively contained.'"

Sir F. Kelly, S. G. for the plaintiffs in error.—The words "commit suicide," to which the Court are now called upon to affix a meaning, have no ascertained technical signification, and therefore the Court will be guided by the intention of the parties to the policy of insurance to be collected from the words used by them. The case of Borradaile v. Hunter, 5 Man. & Gr. 639, must necessarily be brought under the consideration of this Court on the present occasion. That was an action on a life policy of insurance, containing a proviso, that in case "the assured should die by his own hands, or by the hands of justice, or in consequence of a duel," the policy should be void. The assured, as appeared at the trial, threw himself into the Thames and was drowned; and upon an issue whether the assured died by his own hands, the jury found that he "voluntarily threw himself into the water, knowing at the time that he should thereby destroy his life, and intending thereby to do so; but that at the time of committing the act, he was not capable of judging between right and wrong." The verdict having been entered for the defendant, who was a trustee of the insurance company, a motion was subsequently made by Sir Thomas Wilde to enter the verdict for the plaintiff, on the ground that the expression "dying by his own hands" was synonymous with "suicide," and that the question really was, whether the assured was or was not in a sane state of mind at the time of committing the act in question. A majority of the Court of Common Pleas, consisting of Coltman, Erskine, and Maule, J.J. were of opinion that the policy was avoided under the circumstances above stated; and that the proviso included all acts of voluntary self-destruction, and was not limited by the accompanying provisos to acts of felonious suicide. This opinion, it is submitted, and not that of the Lord Chief Justice, was correct; and, if so, this case is a direct authority for the now plaintiffs in error, and against the direction of the learned judge at the trial. [POLLOCK, C.B. referred to Hadfield's case, 1 Col-

Hanson on Lunatics, 480, and to the argument of Mr. Erskine in that case as reported, ib. 483.] The words used in this case by the insurance company must not be so much restricted as to comprise only cases of felonious suicide or felo de se. Why is such a distinction to be imported into the contract entered into by these parties? The words "commit suicide" are exactly equivalent to, and co-extensive with, the words "die by his own hands." The Court will look to the popular meaning of the expression "commit suicide," and if so, they must give to it the general, and not the restricted sense. The term known to the law as applicable to felonious suicide is "self-murder." The words "suicide" and "homicide" are co-extensive, the former being applied to self-destruction, and the latter to the destruction of the life of another person. As homicide may be justifiable, so suicide may occur without moral guilt, as where it is committed by one non compos mentis. [ALDERSON, B.—May not homicide be accidental as well as justifiable? Tomlins's Law Dict. title Homicide.] That would merely shew that the word "suicide" must have a still larger signification than that contended for. The legal meaning of "homicide" will be found in 3 Inst. 54; and there amongst the different kinds of homicide is mentioned homicide by misadventure, which is, "when a man doth an act that is not unlawful which, without any evil intent, tendeth to a man's death." Ib. 66. In Borradaile v. Hunter, the learned judge at the trial (Erskine, J.) expressed his opinion that, if the deceased's mind was so far gone that he did not know the consequences of the act, and the mind was not moving to the act, it was not within the proviso in the policy on which the action was brought; but in the present case, as indeed in most cases, the state of facts is different from that suggested by the learned judge; because here the deceased, although labouring under excitement, did know the consequences of his act. [POLLOCK, C.B.—No difficulty could arise, if, after the word "suicide" in the proviso, were added the words "whether felonious or not."] In construing this proviso, the Court will be guided by the rule as laid down by Maule, J. in Borradaile v. Hunter; he says, "In construing these words, it is proper to consider, first, what is their meaning in the largest sense which, according to the common use of language, belongs to them; and if it should appear that that sense is larger than the sense in which they must be understood in the instrument in question, secondly, what is the object for which they are used? They ought not to be extended beyond their ordinary sense in order to comprehend a case within their object; for that would be to give effect to an intention not expressed; nor can they be so restricted as to exclude a case both within their object and within their ordinary sense without violating the fundamental rule which requires that effect should be given to such intention of the parties as they have used fit words to express." It must, moreover, be borne in mind, whilst endeavouring to ascertain the intention of the parties, that great detriment would be caused to insurance offices, if the term "suicide" were confined to cases of felonious self-destruction, and that it never could have been intended that a jury should have to inquire into the state of mind of the deceased in every case of self-destruction by a party insured. That portion of the judgment of Erskine, J. in Borradaile v. Hunter is, moreover, incorrect in which he assumes that the words "shall commit suicide" "have been popularly understood and judicially considered as importing a criminal act of self-destruction." The more comprehensive is, likewise, it is submitted, the true meaning of these words. If this view be correct, the case of Garrett v. Barclay, 5 Man. & Gr. 643, note (a), which was only a Nisi Prius decision, cannot be supported, and the cases of Kinnear v. Borradaile and Kinnear v. Nicholson, (ib. 644, notes (b) and (c)) cannot be cited as decisions on the point now before the Court. In Borradaile v. Hunter, Erskine, J. thought that suicide must be taken to have a different meaning from the expression "dying by his own hand;" whereas Tindal, C. J. thought that they were essentially the same. On the whole it is submitted that "suicide" is the better expression of the two. [ALDERSON, B.—The act done by a man cannot be called his act if he be labouring under perfect fatuity at the time of committing it, but there may be a partial intention which will suffice to make it his act.] The proper test may be, whether he knows the consequences of his own act, and does it with such knowledge; but insurance offices are not bound to enter into all the more refined metaphysical distinctions of which very many may doubtless be suggested. Then, as to the application of the maxim nosctur a sociis made by Tindal, C. J. in Borradaile v. Hunter, it may be observed that the acts mentioned in the proviso in the policy could hardly have been otherwise conjoined. It may be said also that the word "commit" is only applicable to a criminal act; but this is not so, for after a justification to a declaration in trespass, it is usual to allege that the defendant, therefore, committed the said trespass. The Court will, however, without entering into such nice distinctions, endeavour, from a consideration of the entire instrument, to ascertain and carry out the intention of the parties, and will affix the popular and ordinary meaning to the words which they have used.

J. Henderson, for the defendant in error (the plaintiff below).—The simple question is this—What is to be understood by the word "suicide?" The popular meaning may no doubt be important with a view to answering this question, but this meaning is not that contended for on behalf of the plaintiffs in error. This is a word of modern origin—it has not been necessary for the Courts to affix a meaning to it in interpreting wills—it is not to be found in the old English Bible, and in legal writers it is used as synonymous with felo de se. The definition of felo de se will be found in Hale, P.C. c. 21, and in 4 Bla. Com. 189. [ALDERSON, B.—It is clear that the word suicide includes a felo de se, but is the term confined to felonious self-destruction?] The meaning given to the word "suicide" in Johnson's Dictionary shews that it is so confined; and if the meaning of any word in this policy is doubtful, it must be taken against the insurance company, and in favour of the assured. The word "suicide" signifies the act of a man who slays himself, knowing the consequences and quality of his act; then the verb "commit" is applicable only where the thing done is criminal, at all events, it implies that the thing done is the deliberate act of the will of the doer, and the expression "commit suicide" is equivalent to the phrase, "commit the crime of suicide." Then as to the test suggested, that a person is within the proviso who knows the consequences of his own act, and does it with such knowledge, this test is incorrect, for it might include a lunatic, who, whilst in a fit of lunacy or delirium, destroyed himself. [POLLOCK, C.B.—The law recognizes no difference in the degree of mental alienation, as existing where persons are non compos mentis; but the word "will" is surely applicable only to a sane man.] It is a rule of law that actus non facit rerum nisi mens sit rea; an act, therefore, cannot be legally criminal unless the intentions of the person doing that act were criminal, and a person non compos can have no criminal intention. [POLLOCK, C.B.—But there may be degrees of mental alienation, though not of legal responsibility. PARKES, B.—A man might be competent to make a will, though in such a state of mind as not to be responsible criminally for his actions.] The case of Borradaile v. Hunter, so much relied upon by the plaintiffs in error, will be found quite consistent with the view now contended for. Erskine, J. expressly recognizes the more restricted meaning of the word "suicide" as being correct. Besides, in that case the words of the exception in the policy were somewhat different from those here used; and, at all events, that decision will now be reviewed by this Court. The cases cited in the notes referred to in 5 Man. & Gr. are not material, and reference may be made to The Amicable Company v. Bolland, 4 Bligh, N.S. 194, as an authority for the defendant in error. Lastly, death by the self-destruction of the assured, whilst labouring under mental derangement, is one of those occurrences the probabilities respecting which may be calculated, and against which, therefore, it may be considered one of the special objects of companies like the present to insure; and if the meaning of the exception is doubtful, the words used must be taken contra proferentem.

Sir F. Kelly, in reply.—The authority of Lord Hale is against the defendant in error, for, according to his definition, "suicide" includes self-murder and death per infortunium. Richardson's Dict. titles Suicide and Commit, is likewise in favour of my argument; and the form of a plea of liberum tenementum, as given in Chitt. on Pleading, shews that the word "commit" is not exclusively applicable to a criminal or illegal act. The words used in this policy are large enough to include every act of self-destruction where the party did the act intentionally, and with a knowledge of its probable consequences; and there is nothing contained in the instrument from which it can be supposed that the parties had any intention to give it a more restricted signification. It is therefore submitted that the judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed.

The Court now (June 16), in consequence of a difference of opinion amongst its members, proceeded to deliver judgment seriatim.

JUDGMENT.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am of opinion, on the best consideration I can give to this case, that the direction of the learned judge to the jury on the trial of the cause was right, and that their decision that Louis Schwabe did not, under the circumstances found by them, commit suicide within the meaning of the exception in the policy of insurance upon his life was right. The exception or proviso in the policy is in these terms: "Every policy effected by a person, on his own life shall be void if such person shall commit suicide, or die by duelling, or the hands of justice." The defendant pleaded that Schwabe, whose life was insured by himself, did commit suicide; which was denied by the plaintiff in the action. The evidence was, that the deceased voluntarily took poison in sufficient quantity to cause death, for the purpose of killing himself, but that he was, when he took the poison, of unsound mind. The learned judge told the jury that in order to find a verdict for the defendant in the action they must be satisfied that the deceased died by his own voluntary act, being then able to distinguish between right and wrong, and to appreciate the nature and quality of the act that he was doing so as to be a responsible moral agent. To this direction a bill of exceptions was tendered, it being contended on the part of the defendants that it was sufficient to entitle them to a verdict if the deceased had sufficient mind to intend to kill himself, and to know that the poison would probably have that effect, and that he took the poison with that intent, though he might be unable to distinguish between right and wrong, or to appreciate the nature and quality of the act he was doing, so as to be a responsible moral agent. The question then is, whether, by the word "suicide," as used in the policy, a criminal killing of himself, such as could only be committed by a responsible moral agent, was intended; for if it was, the direction of the learned judge and the verdict of the jury were right, otherwise not. It is admitted that the word is not to be understood in the largest sense of which the word is capable, as it would include the accidental or unintentional killing of himself, which it was not contended would be within the meaning of the exception. The term suicide has no technical or legal meaning; it is derived from the Latin, from the compound word suicidium; but the English word "suicide," is not to be found in any Latin Dictionary or Glossary that I have met with. We must, therefore, consider its ordinary meaning in the English language, as used in that language, taken in connection with the apparent object and intent of the proviso in the policy in which it occurs. In all the English books in which it occurs, legal or otherwise, it is almost invariably, I believe I may say invariably, used to denote a criminal act. In Johnson's Dictionary, when used as denoting an act, it is said to mean "self-murder," "the horrid crime of destroying oneself," and when used as denoting a person is said to mean a self "murderer." In Webster's Dictionary the same meaning is given, and in Rees's Encyclopædia the same, and the same in the Encyclopædia Britannica. In Blackstone's Commentaries, vol. iv. p. 189, the term "suicide" is used as meaning felo de se; and he says, "The suicide is guilty of a double offence, one spiritual and the other temporal, and the law reckons it amongst the highest crimes." Particular instances may be given to shew that the word "suicide" is necessarily used in the English language in a criminal sense, and that such is the meaning of the word in its general and ordinary acceptance. I have not been able to find any passage in any writer in the English language in which the word has otherwise been used. If that be so, is there anything in the policy or the terms of it to shew that it is used in the proviso in question not in the general and ordinary sense, but in another of which it is capable, although unusual? The word is used in a disqualifying exception, a proviso by which under certain circumstances the insurance and premiums paid are forfeited, and the benefit of the policy lost. The usual course is to look strictly to the terms of such a policy, and not to regard them in their ordinary meaning; but in the present case, if the ordinary meaning of the term suicide was more uncertain than it seems to be, the terms used in the proviso itself in connection with it tend to shew the sense in which the insurers who used it intended it should be used; the condition is to be void "if such person shall commit suicide, or die by duelling, or the hands of justice." The three excepted modes of death are classed together in one exception or proviso, and two of them are unquestionably the consequences of crime, and if the maxim nosctur a sociis is applied, it strongly tends to shew that the term "suicide" is used in a criminal sense also. In Borradaile v. Hunter, 5 Manning and Granger, 639, which was cited upon the argument, Mr. Justice Erskine, who agreed with the majority of the judges, says, as one of the grounds for his judgment, "Where I find the terms 'shall commit suicide,' that have been popularly understood and judicially considered as importing a criminal act of self-destruction, exchanged for terms not liable to be so construed, it may, I think, be fairly inferred, that the terms adopted were intended to embrace all cases of intentional self-destruction, unless it can be collected from the immediate context that the parties used them in a more limited sense;" and my Lord Chief Justice Tindal, in his judgment in the same case, says, "If the exception had run in the terms 'shall die by suicide, or by the hands of justice, or in consequence of a duel,' surely no doubt could have arisen that a felonious suicide was intended thereby." I refer to these passages as shewing the opinions of the learned judges as to the meaning of the term suicide, when used in such an exception, and in connection with such other terms as occur in the present case. I forbear to speculate upon the probable objects of the insurers in introducing such a proviso. It can hardly be because such means of death as those excepted are events not to be calculated upon, for there is no doubt but the probabilities of such events are as well calculable as any other; and, moreover, those modes of death are not excepted when the policies are upon the lives of others. It may be that the exception in the case of suicide was introduced for the case of a person deliberately insuring his life, with the intention of committing suicide, in order to benefit his family; or it may be that the insurers were influenced by some higher motive—a wish to check such modes of death as those excepted; either of these objects would seem to indicate that the word was used in its ordinary sense, namely, the commission of the crime: but as no satisfactory result can be drawn from such a speculation, it is better to judge of the case merely by the ordinary language used, taken in connexion with the other terms which are used along with it. Upon the whole, it appears to me there is nothing in this case to shew an intention on the part of the insurer to use the word "suicide" in a more extended sense than that which is ordinarily and properly attributed to it; and that, on the contrary, the context shews that it was their intention to use it in the ordinary and popular sense, and that they have so used it. I therefore think that the direction of the learned judge was correct at the trial, and that the defendant in error is entitled to our judgment.

ROYLE, B.—The question in this case is very short. Louis Schwabe, in the year 1836, insured his own life for 999l. in the office of which the plaintiffs in error were directors, liable to be sued for the money so insured. The policy by which the 999l. was insured contained a clause in these words—"Every policy effected by a person on his own life shall be void if such person shall commit suicide or die by duelling or the hands of justice." Louis Schwabe died in 1841, and the defendant in error obtained letters of administration, and then sued the plaintiffs in error in an action of assumpsit for the 999l. secured by the policy. The plaintiffs in error pleaded that Louis Schwabe did commit suicide, whereby the policy became void, and on this issue was joined. The issue was tried before my brother Cresswell at the Lancashire Summer Assizes last year, and upon the part of the plaintiff in error, a witness was called to prove that Schwabe's death was caused by his having voluntarily, and for the purpose of killing himself, swallowed a quantity of sulphuric acid. The same witness also gave evidence tending to shew that at the time of his swallowing the said sulphuric acid Louis Schwabe was of unsound mind; whereupon my brother Cresswell, who summed up the case, told the jury, in order to find the issue for the plaintiffs in error, they must be satisfied that Louis Schwabe died by his own voluntary act, being then able to distinguish between right and wrong, and to appreciate the nature and quality of the act he was doing, so as to be a rational moral agent. To this ruling the plaintiffs in error have excepted; we have, therefore, to see whether the ruling was right, and this depends upon the meaning of the words in the policy, "shall commit suicide." If it mean "shall destroy his own life under circumstances which would make him a felo de se," then the ruling was right; if it merely mean "shall intentionally kill himself," then the ruling was wrong. The word "suicide" is not, as it appears to me, a word of art, to which any legal meaning is to be affixed, different from that which it is popularly understood to bear. The authorities referred to by the defendant in error, as shewing that "suicide" means the felonious taking away of a man's life, do not, as it seems to me, at all bear out his proposition. Lord Hale, indeed, in the 31st chapter of the Pleas of the Crown, vol. i. p. 411, certainly speaks of felo de se and "suicide," as convertible terms, and defines both the one and the other as being where a man of the age of discretion, and compos mentis, voluntarily kills himself; but it appears to me plain, from the whole context of the passage in question, that Lord Hale did not understand he was there giving a definition of the term suicide, except as it was generally used to mean the same thing as felo de se. This seems manifest from the context; what in the passage in question he calls suicide, he in a few lines above designates as homicide. There can be no doubt that a man who takes away the life of another commits homicide, even though the act were justifiable, or may have happened per infortunium, and therefore was not criminal. See Hale's Pleas of the Crown, c. 39. Taking suicide as meaning the same thing as homicide of one's self, it seems to follow that, in the opinion of Lord Hale, neither guilt nor moral responsibility are necessarily involved in the legal definition of suicide. The passage to which we have been referred in Blackstone's Commentaries seems, instead of confirming the notion that suicide means felo de se, strongly to shew that suicide does not, in the opinion of Mr. Justice Blackstone, necessarily include the notion of moral responsibility. The learned commentator, after stating that a party who destroys himself is not felo de se unless he was in his senses, adds that coroners' juries are apt to push the principle too far, and to hold that every act of suicide is an act of insanity. It is plain the word he uses, suicide, is there used as designating the mere act of self-destruction; otherwise the passage would be insensible. The only other authority referred to in which the word suicide occurs is the recent case of Borradaile v. Hunter, 5 Manning & Granger, 639, an action like this, upon a policy of insurance, in which is the stipulation for making it void, not as in this case if the party should commit suicide, but if he should die by his own hands. There the majority of the Court held that the assured having intentionally destroyed himself, although he was at the time incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong, the policy was void. Chief Justice Tindal differed from the rest of the Court, and at page 668 of his judgment, the following passage occurs:—"The expression 'dying by his own hands,' is in fact no more than the translation into English of the word of Latin origin 'suicide;' but if the exception had run in the terms 'shall die by suicide, or by the hands of justice, or in consequence of a duel,' surely no doubt could have arisen that a felonious suicide was intended thereby." This, although it shews that the Lord Chief Justice would, from the context, have interpreted the word "suicide" in this policy as he had interpreted the words "die by his own hands" in Borradaile v. Hunter, viz. as referring only to a case of self-destruction perpetrated by a person of sound mind, yet shews also he did not think that to be the necessary or natural meaning of the word suicide, standing alone. The distinction between felonious suicide, and suicide not felonious, taken and observed on by the Chief Justice, seems conclusively to shew that in his opinion suicide did not necessarily, ex vi termini, import a criminal act, and, therefore, the act of a responsible moral agent; and, in the same case, near the bottom of page 638, Mr. Justice Erskine speaks of criminal suicide, shewing he took the same view of the meaning of the word suicide as was taken by the Chief Justice. All these authorities seem to me to favour my interpretation of this word; but after all, our decision must rest entirely on what is the ordinary meaning of the term. In my opinion every act of self-destruction is in common language described by the word suicide, provided it is the intentional act of the party, knowing the probable consequences of what he is about. This is, I think, the ordinary meaning of the word. I see nothing in the context to enable me to give it any other than its ordinary signification. For these reasons I think there must be judgment for the plaintiffs in error, and that a verdict de novo must be awarded.

PATERSON, J.—The sole question in this case is, what is the meaning of the words "to commit suicide" in the policy in question? It is argued, first, that these words have a technical meaning, and import a felony. No authority is cited for this position; no case in which the finding of a jury, that A has committed suicide, has been held equivalent to a finding that A has murdered himself, or that A was a felon of himself. Unless some record should be found, or some decision of the Court in which suicide has been held to have the same meaning as self-murder, I am at a loss to know what ground there is for saying the words "to commit suicide" have any technical meaning at all. It is argued, secondly, that the words in their ordinary acceptance import felony. The word suicide, literally translated, means only killing himself or herself. The circumstances attending the act manifestly cannot affect the literal meaning of the word. Reference is made to Hale's Pleas of the Crown, chapter 31, where Lord Hale is speaking of different kinds of murder, and speaks of suicide as felo de se, which, no doubt, he does; but he is treating of criminal suicide only; he no where intimates that the word suicide in itself imports criminal suicide. Johnson's Dictionary and Richardson's Dictionary are also referred to. They are but of very little weight when the Court are considering what the parties to a contract mean by the words they have used. The word "commit" is said always to be used in a bad sense. Be it so: but how does that prove that it communicates the quality of being felonious to the word "suicide"? No suicide is good or meritorious. It must always be spoken of in a bad sense, however pitiable, or one may hope, excusable, the circumstances of it may be. But it is argued, thirdly, that a felonious suicide only is pointed at by this policy, and that this appears by the words themselves, and by the context. Now the words themselves are large enough to embrace self-destruction generally as well as self-murder, though not indeed, as is admitted in Borradaile v. Hunter, 5 M. & G. 639, to embrace cases of mere accident, or of insanity extending to unconsciousness of the act done, or of its physical consequences; because such cases, although comprehended in the very words themselves, cannot be considered to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties, but clearly embracing an act of self-destruction committed by a person who was aware of the probable consequences of the act, and intended those consequences to follow. The context in this case, as in that of Borradaile v. Hunter, is "or die by duelling or the hands of justice," except that in that case the words were "die by his own hands, or by the hands of justice, or in consequence of a duel;" so that the word "die" applied to all the members of the sentence; whereas here the words "commit suicide" are complete as a sentence without any words taken from the other part. I do not know that this makes any difference. It is true the other two modes of death appear to be connected with felony; yet, as I apprehend, actual felony forms no ingredient in the act which occasions an exception from liability; for if it did, it would be competent to the plaintiff in an action to prove that the deceased, although dying by the hands of justice, was, in truth, innocent of the crime for which he suffered; in the same manner as it is no doubt competent to an executor to traverse an inquest and a verdict of felo de se found upon view of the body of his testator by the coroner, and to prove that the deceased, although killed in a duel, had fired his pistol in the air, and never contemplated shooting his opponent. Such defence would certainly be excluded, for the words of exception are express, "die by the hands of justice;" that is, whether guilty or not, or by duelling, whether a felony or not. It seems to me, then, that the exception is not framed with reference to the commission of any felony, or any crime at all, but to guard against the time for the payment of the money insured being accelerated by the voluntary act of the party interested in the money. It is equally so accelerated by the voluntary act if the deceased knew the consequences of his act and intended them to follow, whether he is sane, or under some delusion as to the moral quality of the act done. That the voluntary act of the party interested need not be a felony, is further apparent from this circumstance, to my apprehension, that the clause in the policy goes on to do away with the exception altogether where the deceased has parted with all interest, either for himself or his family, by assigning the policy, or where the deceased has mortgaged it, or charged it for the benefit of creditors, to do away with the exception to the extent of the sum secured. Even felony might, therefore, be committed in these cases, just as much as if the previous exception in the policy had not been made. I do not inquire into the meaning of this qualification of the exception of the policy; whether it has any thing to do with the temptation to destroy himself being removed from the insured, when he has parted with his interest, or not, or whether it is inserted as an inducement to those who want to raise money on a policy at this office; or whether any, and what other reason may be assigned; it is sufficient for my purpose that it tends to shew that the contracting parties did not regard the commission of felony as necessary in order to bring a person within the exception in their contract. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the words "commit suicide" mean only "kill himself;" and that the true question to be put to the jury is that which was put by Mr. Justice Erskine in Borradaile v. Hunter, viz. whether the deceased knew the probable consequences of his act, and did that act voluntarily, intending such consequences to follow, and that no question should be put as to the act done being criminal or not. It follows that the judgment should be reversed, in my opinion, and a verdict de novo awarded.

ALDERSON, B.—I also am, in this case, of the same opinion that there ought to be a verdict de novo, and I shall say a very few words upon the points raised. The true principle governing cases of this sort seems to be very well laid down by my brother Maule in the case of Borradaile v. Hunter. The words in question seem to me in this case to have their proper construction when taken as including all cases of voluntary self-destruction. They do not apply to cases in which the will is not exercised at all, as where death results from accident or delirium, but where the self-destruction is voluntary, although the will may be perverted. It seems to me, therefore, that the argument arising out of the peculiar use of the word suicide in this contract is fallacious, and that the word is often used in its most extended sense, that viz. which has been assigned to it on behalf of the plaintiffs in error. For instance, to take so common a book as the Encyclopædia Britannica, under the head of suicide I find this observation: "The general causes of suicide are twofold—insanity and crime." So that the word "suicide" has often in its ordinary acceptance in the English language that enlarged sense, and it is not, therefore, to be confined to cases of criminal intention alone. Then a reliance is placed upon the words in the company of which it is found in the policy, "death by duelling or by the hands of justice." I doubt, however, whether that argument carries the case much further. Suppose a person insured was to die in a duel, I do not conceive it would be competent to say that he was insane at the time. Cases may easily be suggested, in which a duel might be fatal, and yet not felonious; such as a duel in the course of war, or the like. The case, however, has been so fully gone into by those learned judges who have immediately preceded me, that I shall do no more than express my concurrence with their judgments.

PARKE, B.—This question may be very shortly stated, since by the terms of the policy, all conditions and regulations endorsed are incorporated in it, and one of these is, that every policy effected by a person on his own or her own life, shall be void, if such person "shall commit suicide, or die by duelling, or the hands of justice." On the trial, my brother Cresswell told the jury, in order to find the said issue for the defendants, it was necessary that the jury should be satisfied that Louis Schwabe, the deceased, died by his own voluntary act, being then able to distinguish between right and wrong, and to enter into and appreciate the nature and quality of the act which he was doing, so as to be a responsible moral agent. The burthen of the proof as to his dying by his own voluntary act was on the defendants, and that being established, the jury must assume that he was of sane mind, and consequently a moral agent, unless the contrary should appear in evidence. The question is, whether this direction was correct. I agree with the majority of the judges who have preceded me, that the direction as to the necessity of his being a responsible moral agent is wrong. I think, according to the proper construction of this policy, the act of self-destruction being voluntary, it is immaterial whether the party committing that act was, at the time of its commission, sane or not. This being a written contract between the parties, the construction belongs to the Court, and the Court must adopt the usual rule and construe the proviso as well as other parts of the instrument according to the ordinary meaning of the language used. I refer to the authority of Lord Tenterden in Moody & Malkin, 191, 195, as to the proviso, and every other part of an instrument being construed on the same principle and, except the terms of art or technical words, unequivocally in their proper sense, unless any thing to the contrary appear from the context. An ancient word may, no doubt, be explained by cotemporaneous usage—words which acquire a peculiar sense by a particular usage. Here there is no occasion for any of these exceptions in construing this proviso; the two latter are inapplicable, and there is no ground for saying the word suicide is a legal technical term or word of art. An Inquisition stating that the deceased had committed suicide would be clearly informal or bad. Before the case of Borradale v. Hunter, there certainly is not any decision of any Court as to the express meaning of the precise words now under consideration. Nor can the intimation of an opinion by Lord Chief Justice Tindal, by way of illustration of his argument as to the meaning of the expression then before the Court, have the same effect as a decision. The whole question resolves itself into an inquiry as to the sense of the words used in the ordinary language of the present day, the instrument to be construed, bearing date the 4th day of July, 1836. We are all perfectly competent to form an opinion on such a subject, and need not refer for information to text-writers or lexicographers or authors ancient or modern. Whether the case depended on our explanation or on dictionaries, the result would necessarily be the same. Johnson explains the word suicide by "self-murder, the horrid crime of self-murder," which no doubt it includes. Webster says, both "self-murder," and the act of designedly destroying oneself; and he states this to be a word of modern introduction; and he adds, to constitute suicide, the person must be of years of discretion, referring to Blackstone inaccurately for a passage in that author, vol. 4, page 179, which applies to persons being felo de se. Webster says, that it means both self-murder and the act of designedly destroying oneself; and Richardson says it is the act of slaying of himself, or self-murder. The question does not depend on the authority of such authors, but turns on the natural meaning of the language now used. I must own I feel no doubt as to the import of the expression to commit suicide. In ordinary parlance this expression is applied to every one who has purposely killed himself, whether from tedium of life or transport of grief, or in a fit of temporary insanity. To die by his own hand, or to commit suicide, seems to me to be all one, and to apply to all voluntary self-destruction. I do not see any reason why a different sense from the ordinary one should be attributed to the instrument in question; on the contrary, I see very good grounds for believing the word is used in the ordinary sense to avoid the consequence which would have followed the adoption of such words, as the committing murder on himself, or self-murder. It may be well supposed that the jury would, in favour of the family of the deceased, take the same lax view of the evidence as coroners' juries generally do. I think, therefore, the judgment ought to be reversed, and a verdict de novo awarded.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I regret that I differ from the majority of the Court who have already delivered their opinions. It was after the fullest deliberation that I felt compelled to come to the conclusion that the direction of my brother Cresswell to the jury at the trial was correct in point of law, and that the plaintiff below is entitled to the judgment of the Court. It is my duty, with whatever reluctance and hesitation, to state my own view of the case, and the reasons upon which the conclusion I have arrived at is founded. The question in point of form has been so clearly stated already, that it is unnecessary to state it again, for in substance it is, what is the meaning of the words "commit suicide" in the policy in question? Does the expression mean and include that the party was compos mentis, that he was a responsible being capable of distinguishing right from wrong, as stated by my brother Cresswell to the jury? or was the expression applicable to a person who produces his own death, and also uses the means of destruction with a knowledge of the effect it will produce, and with the special intention of producing death, but whose understanding and judgment or will are so perverted by disease that he has ceased to be responsible criminally for his conduct, in short who is insane, possibly upon every other point but the physical effects of using a deadly weapon? In considering the question, almost every thing turns upon the meaning of the words as ordinarily occurring in the English language and in the English authors, and especially in books written on law or morals. Now, what is the meaning of the word "suicide," merely as an English word, according to the best authorities? Does it mean a killing of oneself in the same sense that "homicide" means simply killing of a human being, whether by accident, negligence, or in self-defence? or does it imply the criminal taking away of one's own life? The word is of modern origin; it does not occur in the Bible, nor in any English author before the reign of Charles II, probably not until after the reign of Queen Anne. As far as I have been able to trace it, it first occurs as an English word in Hale's Pleas of the Crown. Lord Hale was a judge during the Commonwealth, and died in the year 1676; his work was published in 1736. The word, however, is not in Hawkins, whose work was first published in 1716, probably written many years after Lord Hale, and published many years before it. The word is to be found in Blackstone. The legal authorities will be adverted to presently, but I wish to notice first the authorities not legal. Now the meaning assigned to the word in almost all dictionaries, is, that it signifies self-murder. Johnson, in his Dictionary, says suicide, or "self-murder, the horrid crime of destroying oneself." The actor is a self-murderer, and Johnson gives no other signification of the word at all. In Richardson's Dictionary, it is a "slayer of himself;" also, the "slaying of himself is self-murder." In the Dictionnaire Universelle of the French language, published in 1779, it is said the word was introduced into the French language by the Abbé Fontaine, and a quotation is given from his works where it is manifestly used in the sense given to it by Johnson. Fontaine was born in 1686, and died in 1765. (a) In the year 1644 were published the works of John Donne, dean of St. Paul's, some of whose poetry is quoted by Horae Tooke, in his letters to Junius, and some also in the Nouvelles (of Fontaine), and who died in 1631; and in this edition of his works, published some years after his death, his treatise entitled Biathanatos is to be found, which is "A declaration of that paradox, or thesis, that self-homicide is not so naturally a sin that it may never be otherwise." (b) The word suicide does not occur in this work professedly treating upon the subject. It may therefore be presumed the word was not then in general use—probably not in use at all. In 1785 Archdeacon Paley first published his work, the Principles of Political and Moral Philosophy. Chapter III. Book IV. is on suicide, and all throughout that chapter the word is used as the act of a rational, moral, and responsible agent, and in no other sense. In 1790 Charles Moore, Rector of Caxton, in Kent, published a work, entitled "A Full Enquiry into the subject of Suicide; to which is added, as being closely connected with the subject, Two Treatises on Duelling and Gaming;" and at page 4 there is the following passage: "There are points there that have been settled, and exceptions have been made previous to the general charge of guilt in all who put a sudden end to their own lives; for although every person who terminates his lawful existence by his own hand commits suicide, yet he does not, therefore, always commit murder, which alone constitutes its guilt. The same distinction is necessary in regard to a man's killing himself as it would be if he killed another person, which latter he may do either inadvertently or legally, and therefore in either case innocently, without the imputation of being the murderer of another. Where a man kills himself inadvertently or involuntarily, it comes under the legal description of accidental death, or per infortunium; but as to his doing it legally, or as to his doing it illegally, the law allows of no such case. The only instance of innocence is that which it allows to the commission of voluntary suicide, as in the case of madness, when a man, being indeed under no moral guidance, can be exposed to no imputation of guilt on account of his behaviour to himself or to others." In the Encyclopædia Britannica the explanation of the word suicide is, "the crime of self-murder on the person who commits it;" although it is true that the act in the latter part of the same article, as also in Blackstone's Commentaries, is spoken of as the act of suicide, no doubt, apart from the guilt, or the voluntary intention to commit it, yet this seems to arise from the imperfection of human language, by which the word health, which, no doubt, naturally means a state of good health, is spoken of as the condition of a person, with reference to health, and includes bad health, as we speak of a bad shilling, because we have no better expression to use for the purpose, the real fact being that it is no shilling at all. There is a treatise on law in the Encyclopædia Britannica, in which suicide is spoken of. It is to be found in the second volume of the Pure Sciences, 711; in speaking of offences against the self, the writer says, "There are cases where society may interfere to prevent or to punish;" and he says, "This observation applies to suicide, the greatest offence that man can commit against himself." These are all the lay authorities I think it necessary to refer to; but there are legal authorities which, if unopposed by other and greater authorities, I should deem binding and conclusive on the subject in a court of law. Lord Hale, in the work already alluded to, defines felo de se, or suicide, to be where a man of the age of discretion, and compos mentis, voluntarily kills himself by stabbing, poison, or in any other way. Judge Blackstone, in the Commentaries, first published in 1765, uses the word in connection with self-murder, in the same sense as Lord Hale, and the other judges; 4th vol. p. 289. In Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, title Suicide, there is the following passage:—"By the rubric before the burial office, persons who have laid violent hands on themselves shall not have that office used at their interment; and the reason thereof given by the canon law is, because they die in the commission of a mortal sin, and therefore this extended not to idiots and lunatics, or persons otherwise of insane mind, and children under the age of discretion, or the like; so also not to those who do it involuntarily, as where a man kills himself by accident; for in such cases it is not their crime but their very great misfortune." Burn's Ecclesiastical Law was, I believe, first published in the year 1760, and there is a note, by the learned editor of this work, published in the year 1942, in which, commenting upon the statute 4 Geo. 4, ch. 52, in which the expression suicide is of course not to be found, but the only expression used is, "persons who are felo de se," the learned editor says, by that statute suicides are to be buried in the churchyard at night. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that the learned editor of that work considered that the word suicide was properly used in making that note as expressing precisely the same thing which in the statute is expressed by felo de se. In Jacob's Law Dictionary, published in 1772, under the word suicide you are immediately referred to "self-murder;" and on referring to the word self-murder, there are some observations about the law having ranked the crime among the greatest offences, and there are references there given to Blackstone's Commentaries. It should seem, therefore, that the word has never been used by any law writer, except in the sense of a criminal taking away of one's own life, at least I am not aware of any instance in any law writer of its use in any other sense. It may, therefore, be presumed, that the word is of legal introduction from this history of it, and was, perhaps, first taken from the law writers by Archdeacon Paley, who used it very shortly after the publication of Blackstone's Commentaries; it has since become a word of much more general use; but I am not aware of any authority by which it can be shown that it has lost the original meaning, to express which it was originally formed or adopted from some other language; and I think it is clear that, although it may possibly sometimes admit in modern times of a more loose and vague interpretation from the imperfection of language, to which I have already adverted, it certainly does mean self-destruction by a person compos mentis and morally responsible for his acts; and the question is, whether that meaning so given is what was intended by the parties to this contract. Now in this policy I find it coupled with the word "commit," the expression is "commit suicide." The meaning of "commit" in Johnson, with reference to this use of the word, is to perpetrate or to do a fault, or to be guilty of the crime perpetrated; "to commit," therefore, is "to act," but always in an ill sense; and there is no material difference between Johnson's Dictionary in this respect and Richardson, and, I believe, Webster or any other. If, therefore, it be admitted, as I think it must be, that one meaning of suicide imports, not a moral act, but a criminal act, the use of the expression "commit suicide" affords a strong reason for believing that the parties to the contract used the word in that sense, unless one has a far stronger reason for believing the parties to this contract used the word in some other sense. The sentence altogether in which it appears may throw some light on the matter: it is coupled with death by duelling or by the hands of justice; and the condition is, not "if the party shall die by suicide," but if he shall "commit suicide." I think this imports some deliberation, and with respect to this act, therefore, it must be a criminal act, and not an act the result of insanity, which may leave the party intelligence enough to know the means of death, but without any moral control over his actions. Again, does the nature of the instrument itself supply any argument either way? The object of such a policy is generally to make a provision for the family of the insured, and he naturally desires to include all risks. It is admitted, he is protected, not only against the common chances of death by disease, but against accidents, or even negligence of the grossest kind. He may become the immediate cause of his own death by a deadly weapon, provided he be so insane as to be utterly unconscious of what he is doing. But, according to the argument for the defendant, if he retains just enough of the glimmering of intelligence to produce death by competent means, but has entirely lost all reason so as to be deprived altogether of all moral sense, and so as to be for any other act but this a complete madman, the policy is void. I own I cannot from the nature of the contract believe that this was what the parties intended. A man anxious to provide for his family would, among the possible calamities of life that might terminate it, anticipate madness in some form or other as one of them; and whether it prostrated his intellect altogether, or produced delusion, or destroyed only a part of his faculties, it would, in my judgment, make no difference. The language used in the agreement between the parties does not necessarily exclude this risk. I think, therefore, as against the office, this risk ought to be considered as included; but, in examining the question on more general principles, I am induced to come to the same conclusion. In the eye of the law, with reference to crime, a man is either compos mentis and responsible, or he is non compos mentis and irresponsible. Physiologically, no doubt, it is otherwise; gradations are perhaps perceptible from the highest perfection of intellect to the darkest obscuration of the mind; but, in point of law, as soon as it is ascertained that a person, to use the language of my brother Cresswell in directing the jury, has lost all sense of right and wrong, it matters not what else of the human faculties or capacities remains, he ceases to be a responsible agent, and in my judgment can no more commit suicide than he can commit murder. Lastly, the views taken by the defendant's counsel appear to me to be opposed to all the principles of sound philosophy which can be applied to the subject. It is admitted of course that the office would be liable if death ensued from any of the ordinary casualties of life, even resulting from the act of the party insured, provided the act was not done with an intention to kill himself. The act of a raving madman, or of a patient under the influence of disease, is protected by the policy, the consequences are not foreseen, nor, as it is called for the purpose of argument, intended; although whether an insane man can be said to intend any thing is a very great question which is worthy of much consideration before we come to an opposite conclusion. So if insanity should produce delusion and deprive a man of the use of his ordinary senses, and a party should mistake a deadly weapon for an instrument of music, and fancy he was playing it, and was destroying his own life, this would not be committing suicide within the purpose of the policy; but what if the delusion, instead of applying to an instrument of death, applied to the man himself? Suppose he believed he was Marcus Curtius, and ought to leap into a gulph, or that he was one of the Decii and must sacrifice himself for the benefit of his country? or what if in an insane delusion he fancied himself an apostle and that it became his duty to die the death of a martyr? what sound philosophy is there in taking a distinction between a delusion about the instrument of death and a delusion with respect to the man against whom it is to be used? or what distinction in point of good sense can be taken between physical blindness in consequence of which a party insured walks into a well, or intellectual or moral blindness which, leaving him the use of his senses and a knowledge of the physical consequences of his acts, has deprived him of all judgment which should control and govern those acts, and of all moral sense to perceive their consequences? It may be said that when a delusion extends to the character or condition of the party, so that he mistakes his own identity, he does not mean to kill himself; and in such a case the office would be liable. But how far is this doctrine to be carried, supposing under a delusion he believed he had committed a sin for which he ought to put himself to death, and that this was the result of insanity? Is this a mistake of his identity? How is a judge to direct a jury so as to steer clear of the various and complicated difficulties that might arise from this view of the subject? In my opinion, such matters as these ought to find no place in the decision of a question of this deep importance, in which are involved, from the present extensive practice of life insurance, the peace, the happiness, and the security of thousands of families. Some simple, clear, and safe rule ought to be laid down on a subject in which the public is so deeply interested. In my judgment, if death be the result of disease, whether by affecting the senses or by affecting the reason, the insurance office is liable under this policy, whether the privation of reason is total or partial—whether it produces a delusion of one kind or another—whether it affects sensation, apprehension, memory, judgment, or wit, or any of the moral and intellectual powers which constitute our nature; if the act be not the act of a sane responsible creature, but is the result of any delusion or perversion, whether physical, intellectual, or moral, it is not the act of the man, and to hold otherwise seems to me to be a departure from the simplicity of the law, and to be repugnant to that sound policy which is the spirit of all law. I shall only add, I have not adverted to the case of Borradaile v. Hunter, because the expression in that case was, "die by his own hand," and is different from the expression in this case, "commit suicide." That decision appears to me to be no authority upon the point arising here. The opinion of the majority of the Court being in favour of the plaintiffs in error, there must, however, be judgment for them.

Judgment reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

ON ERROR FROM THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

(Before TINDAL, C.J.—MAULE, CRESSWELL, and ERLE, JJ.—PARKE, ROLFE, and PLATT, BB.)
THE YORK AND NORTH MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY v. THE QUEEN.

Argued May 9.—Decided June 13.

Where a writ of mandamus was issued to a railway company, commanding them to make a pond in each of several portions of fields, cut off from the residue of such fields by the railway; and it appeared that the Act required them, where fields containing ancient watering-places for cattle were intersected by the railway, to make proper watering-places for those portions of the fields from which access to the ancient watering-places was cut off, it not appearing on the face of the writ that the ponds thereby required to be made were necessary, or that one additional watering-place would not have been sufficient for the portions of land cut off from the ancient watering-places:—Held, that the writ was erroneous, and not valid in law, inasmuch as it ordered the company to do that which they were not under the Act of Parliament required to do.

This was a writ of error from the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, which will be found reported in 14 L. J. N. S., Q. B. 277, 281. The facts of the case may shortly be stated thus:—A writ of mandamus issued from the Court of Queen's Bench, commanding the defendants, in pursuance of the Act of Parliament by which they were incorporated (the stat. 6 & 7 Wm. 4, c. 81), to make ponds or watering-places in certain closes or pieces of land intersected by the railway, under the 88th section of that Act. To this writ the defendants made a return, stating an indenture between Sir W. M. Milner, the prosecutor of the said writ, and themselves, by which, in consideration of his not appealing the alteration of their line, it was agreed that they should pay to Sir W. M. Milner, as for the special damage thereby occasioned to his lands and tenements, and particularly to a mansion-house of his called Bolton Lodge, the sum of 5,000l. to be paid as therein mentioned, and to be exclusive of the value of the land which the company would require for the purposes of the railway, and damages which the company might commit, either to the said Sir W. M. Milner, or his tenants, and which land and damages were to be valued and paid for by the company in the manner provided for by the Act, unless the parties to the deed should otherwise agree; and further, that whenever any closes or pieces or parcels of land or ground belonging to him should be intersected by the railway, and if the adjoining land belonged to Sir W. M. Milner, and he should require the same, those parts on each side of the railway should be thrown into the adjoining land by removing the fences, drains, gates, and stiles, in a sufficient and workmanlike manner, and that the company should and would, at their own expense, make and complete such fences, drains, gates, and stiles, and other conveniences as might be necessary for the re-dividing of the fields on the same estate which should be intersected by the railway, and for laying them open to the adjoining fields of the said estate for the purpose of convenient occupation. The defendants below further stated that Sir W. M. Milner gave notice that in pursuance of the deed he required them to make such fences, drains, gates, stiles, and other conveniences as might be necessary, setting out as one head of the works which he required to be done the ponds, to compel the making whereof the writ of mandamus was issued. The defendants below then asserted that they did execute the works required except the ponds, and the return concluded with asserting that the cutting off of ponds and watering places as stated in the writ, and the damages occasioned thereby, were part of the special damages covered by the 5,000l.; and, further, that the ponds which the writ required them to make were not conveniences within the meaning of the indenture above mentioned. To this return there was a traverse, setting out at length the said indenture, bearing date the 1st of May, 1837, and concluding with special traverses of the assertions of the defendants below above set forth. To the above traverse there was a demurrer and joinder, and after argument the Court of Queen's Bench gave judgment in favour of the prosecutor, and ordered that a peremptory writ of mandamus should issue. Upon this judgment the present writ of error was brought under the provisions of the recent statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 67, intituled "An Act to enable parties to sue out and prosecute Writs of Error in certain cases upon the proceedings on Writs of Mandamus." In the course of the argument reference was made to several sections of the Act of Parliament 6 & 7 Wm. 4, c. 81, which is intituled "An Act for making a Railway from the City of York to unite the township of Althofts with various branches of Railway, all in the West-Riding of the County of York, or County of the said City;" but it will be found that the judgment of this Court proceeded entirely on the wording of the 88th section of the last-mentioned Act (the material part of which section is set out in the judgment), and on the form of the writ of mandamus which is set out at length in the report of the proceedings in the Court below, 14 L. J. N. S. Q. B. 277, to which, for the sake of brevity, the reader is referred. It will be proper to add that the argument in the Court of Error has been reported very shortly, because it was unnecessary for the Court to give any decision upon several points raised in it.

Martin, Q. C. for the plaintiffs in error.—There are two questions more especially for the consideration of the Court in this case: first, whether the writ of mandamus is not altogether erroneous? secondly, whether the indenture of the 1st of May, 1837, has not the effect of substituting its own provisions for those contained in the Act which constitutes the railway company? Now, by reading the 21st and 88th sections of the above Act in connexion with each other, it is clear that, when a field containing a watering-place for cattle was traversed by the railway, so that cattle in one portion of the field could no longer obtain access to the pond, it was the duty of the company to provide some convenient watering-place for such cattle, but it was not obligatory on them to provide a separate watering-place in each field so intersected. In other words, the company were only required to provide convenient watering-places at their own discretion in lieu of those to which the access was cut off by the line of railway. Then, with reference to the indenture, the effect of this instrument was in fact to supersede the provisions of the Act of Parliament, and to substitute for those provisions the private agreement between the parties, so as to preclude Sir W. Milner, who was a party to that deed, from falling back upon the Act. The portion of a railway Act relating to the purchase of land is neither more nor less than a private bargain between the company and the owner of the land; it is a compulsory contract obligatory on those parties, but unlike a public Act, which is binding upon all men, and the owner cannot, therefore, avail himself both of the Act of Parliament and of the indenture entered into between himself and the company (Blakemore v. The Glamorgan and Swansea Canal Company, 1 Mylne & K. 154); consequently Sir W. Milner was not entitled to the benefit of the 21st section in addition to the 5,000l. paid by the company as compensation for damage caused by the railway; nor is any duty imposed by the 88th section on this company such as is sought to be enforced by this writ of mandamus.

Knowles, Q. C. for the defendant in error.—The company were bound not merely to make watering-places, but to make them in particular fields, and there is nothing to show that the agreement between the parties was meant to exclude the operation of the Act. The former was intended to cover damage not compensated by the latter.

Martin, Q. C. in reply.

JUDGMENT.

TINDAL, C. J. now (June 13) proceeded to deliver the judgment of the Court.—In this case a writ of mandamus issued, which recited the passing of an Act of Parliament 6 & 7 Wm. 4, c. 81, incorporating the North Midland Railway Company, and giving them power to make the railway; and recited that it was enacted (see sec. 88) that the company should, at their own expense, make such arches and bridges, culverts, drains, or other passages, over, under, or by the side of the said railway, and the fences on the sides thereof respectively, of such dimensions as should be sufficient at all times to convey the water as clearly from the lands adjoining or lying near to the said railway, as before the making of the said railway, without obstructing or causing any damage to any of the said lands; and also the said company should make proper watering-places for cattle in all cases where, by means of the said railway, the cattle of any person occupying lands adjacent thereto should be deprived of access to their ancient watering-places, and to supply the same at all times with water from such rivers, brooks, streams, or springs of water as would have supplied the cattle of such person if the said railway had not been made, or from any other source from which such water could be lawfully obtained and used for that purpose; and it recited also another Act, passed in the 1st Victoria, enabling the company to alter their line of railway, and the writ further recited that the company, under the power said provisions of the said Acts, extended their railway; and further, that the company, under the powers of the said Act, had made the railway through and intersected certain closes of Sir William Milner, in the occupation of his tenants, in which places there were ancient ponds or watering-places for cattle; and that by means of the said railway having so intersected the said closes, the said ancient ponds or watering-places for cattle had been severed and cut off from one portion of the said closes, respectively; and the cattle of the said tenants so respectively occupying such portion of the said closes, had been thereby deprived of access to their present property; and further, that the company had been required to make proper watering-places for cattle in such portions of the said closes, respectively, but had neglected to do so; wherefore, they were commanded to make, at their own cost and charges, proper watering-places for cattle in such portions, respectively, of the said several closes of land, and to supply the same at all times with water, &c. The company returned an indenture made between them and Sir William Milner, between the passing of the first and second Acts, whereby they covenanted to pay 5,000*l.* for the special damage which he would sustain, by reason of the railway passing through his land, and to make certain conveniences, and do certain other acts in the event of any of his fields being damaged by the cutting off a portion of the fields; and the return stated that the company did pay the sum of 5,000*l.* in full satisfaction and discharge of the special damage sustained by Sir William Milner, and alleged that the ponds required to be made by the company were the same conveniences which the company had covenanted to make, by the above-mentioned indenture. Sir William Milner traversed both branches of this return, to which the company demurred specially, and the Court below gave judgment on the return, and awarded a peremptory mandamus. A writ of error was brought under the provisions of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 67, and the case was argued before us after Easter Term, when two questions were raised; first, whether the writ of mandamus was good; secondly, whether the indenture made between the parties imposing on the company the obligation therein contained, was or was not affected by the Act of Parliament. On the first question it was contended that the writ was erroneous, for that the cutting off a portion of the field, and thereby depriving the cattle in one portion from access to the water in the other, was the damage provided for by the 21st section of the Act, and if Sir William Milner sustained such damage, he should have sought compensation in the manner thereby pointed out; secondly, that the 88th section, upon which the writ of mandamus was founded did not at all apply to cases where fields were intersected by the railway, but to closes where the railway did not pass through the lands which prevented the cattle in the lands adjacent from going off these lands to their several watering-places not being in the same lands, but elsewhere; thirdly, that even if the injury sustained by Sir William Milner was one for which he could have a remedy by mandamus, the writ was erroneous in ordering the company to do what they were not under the Act required to do, for that it required them to make a pond in each of the said several portions of fields cut off from the residue of such fields by the railway, whereas the 88th section of the Act, if applicable at all, merely requires them to make proper watering-places. It is unnecessary to give any opinion upon the two first objections, as we are of opinion this last objection to the writ is well founded. There is nothing on the face of it to show that eight ponds are necessary, and it is quite consistent with all that appears on the face of the writ, that one watering-place would have been sufficient and proper for the whole of them. If, therefore, it commands something to be done which is not shown to be required by the statute, it is not valid in law. The judgment of the Court below, awarding the peremptory mandamus, must therefore be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

ON ERROR FROM THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

(Before TINDAL, C.J.—COLTMAN, MAULE, and CRESSWELL, JJ.—PARKER, ALDERSON, ROLFE, and PLATT, BB.)

Argued May 11.—Determined June 13.

An agreement whereby the prosecutor of an indictment for an assault on a sheriff's officer, and for a riot, has agreed not to proceed on the indictment, and not to offer evidence in support of it, and has likewise agreed to withdraw an execution under a fi. fa., in consideration that the defendants agreed to pay the costs of the prosecution for the assault and riot, and of an action for a wrongful levy under the fi. fa., is altogether invalid, as being founded on an illegal consideration.

This was an action of assumpsit; and the declaration stated that, before the making of the promise of the defendants (Leeman and Pearson), one George Emmitt was indebted to the plaintiff in 150*l.*, that plaintiff recovered judgment against him in the Court of Queen's Bench, and thereupon sued out a writ of fi. fa. that the sheriff accordingly made out his warrant, and delivered it to one Acton to be executed, and that by virtue of this warrant and writ, the said Acton entered upon a farm and into a messuage and dwelling-house of George Emmitt, situate &c. and seized certain goods, &c.; and that whilst so in possession, one William Emmitt, claiming title to the farm, &c. had, together with divers other persons, to wit, George Emmitt and five others, assaulted Acton, and his followers and assistants, and forcibly and violently ejected and expelled them from the said messuage and dwelling-house, and from the possession of divers goods and chattels seized and taken by them, and kept them so ejected and expelled until Acton, in order to retake possession, by virtue of the warrant, had necessarily and unavoidably a little broken the outer door, and had thereby re-entered and retaken the goods and chattels in the dwelling-house from which he had been so expelled. That thereupon William Emmitt had commenced an action of trespass in the Court of Queen's Bench against the said sheriff and Acton for the said entry into the messuage and dwelling-house, and the said seizing, &c., that the verdict of the jury was, before the making of the promise by the now defendants, returned for William Emmitt on the first issue [Not Guilty], and for the sheriff, &c. on the other issues. That after the entry of Acton into the messuage and dwelling-house, and the assaulting, ejecting, expelling, &c. a certain indictment against William Emmitt, George Emmitt, and five others, for riotously assembling to disturb the peace, and for assaulting Acton and his followers, &c. on the occasion above mentioned, had been preferred by the now plaintiff, and the indictment having been found at the Yorkshire Lent Assizes, A.D. 1842, stood for trial at the summer assizes for the said county, and the prosecutor was then and there, after the trial and verdict in the said cause, about to proceed further on such indictment, and to try the same, and adduce and offer evidence in support thereof. The declaration then stated that, before and at the time of the making the promise by the defendants, divers costs and charges had been incurred in and about the seizing and retaining in possession, and that a large balance of the damages and costs recovered against George Emmitt remained unsatisfied, and that divers large costs and charges had been incurred in defending the action brought by William Emmitt against the sheriff, and in prosecuting the said indictment and were due by the now plaintiff to his attorney. The declaration then proceeded thus:—"And thereupon afterwards, to wit, on, &c. in consideration that the prosecutor (to wit, the now plaintiff) of the indictment against George Emmitt and others (naming them) would, to wit, at the request of the defendants, not proceed further on such indictment, and of the sheriff of Yorkshire withdrawing, to wit, by and with the consent and direction of the now plaintiff at the request of the now defendants, from the possession of the crops and effects at the farm, under an execution against George Emmitt at the suit of the now plaintiff, the now defendants undertook and promised the plaintiff to pay him, on or before the last day of Michaelmas Term next thereafter, the balance of the principal money and costs then remaining unsatisfied in the original cause, to wit, Keir v. George Emmitt, and the balance of costs and charges in and about the execution of the warrant of fi. fa. issued in the same cause; and the now plaintiff avers that, confiding in the promise, &c. the prosecutor of the indictment, to wit, the now plaintiff, did not proceed further on such indictment; and that afterwards, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, at the said summer assizes, &c. the said prosecutor of the indictment did, by and with the assent of the said Acton, &c. instruct counsel to inform, and by such counsel did inform, the said justices, &c. of and concerning the premises, and did then and there, by and with the assent and leave of the Court thereupon, forbear to proceed further and to offer any evidence upon the said indictment; and thereupon the said persons so indicted, &c. were in due form of law, by a jury of the said county, acquitted of the premises in the indictment charged upon them, of which, &c. (notice to defendants)." The declaration then averred that the plaintiff did, in further pursuance of the agreement above mentioned, withdraw the execution against the said George Emmitt, but that the defendants had disregarded their promise, and had not paid, &c. (breach), whereby the plaintiff had lost the balance of the principal money and costs recovered against George Emmitt, and had become liable to pay, and had paid, the balance of the costs and charges incurred in and about the execution of the warrant. There were two other counts in the declaration, which it is not material to set out. The defendants pleaded several pleas, the second of which set out the indictment, and concluded thus:—"And so the defendants say that the said consideration for the said supposed promise in the said first count mentioned was and is illegal, and such supposed promise was and is wholly null and void."—Verification.

Demurrer to all the pleas and joinder. The defendant's points were, that the considerations for the promises in the declaration (as appearing upon the declaration and pleas) are illegal, and the contracts illegal and void. The demurrer was argued in the Court of Queen's Bench in Trinity Term 1844 (see Keir v. Leeman, 6 Q. B. 308), and judgment was given by that Court for the defendants, on which judgment the present writ of error was brought.

Bias, for the plaintiff in error.—The question for this Court to decide may be simply stated to be, whether an agreement not to proceed on an indictment for a misdemeanor in consideration of the payment by the defendant of the costs incurred is illegal. The distinction between compounding a felony and compounding a misdemeanor is sufficiently broad; and Collins v. Blanton, 2 Wils. 341, is the only case in which it has been held that an agreement not to give evidence at the trial of an indictment for a misdemeanor in consideration of the payment of a certain sum of money is illegal. For a trespass it is open to the party aggrieved to proceed either by indictment or by civil action, and if damages were recovered in the latter, the Attorney-General would no doubt enter a nolle pros. as to the former; which shews that the offence charged in the indictment cannot be considered as a criminal offence, of which it would be against the policy of the law to allow a composition. In Res v. Crisp, 1 B. & Ald. 282, it was held that the statute 18 Eliz. c. 5, which forbids the compounding of any offence upon colour or pretence of process, or without process upon colour of any offence against any penal law, does not apply to offences cognizable only before magistrates; and the statute just mentioned was not in affirmance of the common law, but restrictive of it. Then there are many authorities to shew that in practice misdemeanours are frequently compounded, and that the Courts sanction such compositions. (Williams v. Hedley, 8 East, 378; Johnson v. Ogilby, 3 P. Williams, 277; Drage v. Ibberson, 2 Esp. 643.) Kyd on Awards, 2nd ed. 64, and Watson on Arbitration and Awards, 47, contain references to several other cases, which are likewise in point. In Collins v. Blanton, the agreement between the parties had for its object to stifle a prosecution for perjury; and in giving judgment, Wilmut, C.J. dwells particularly upon the enormity of the offence of wilful and corrupt perjury, which, he observes, is "a crime most detrimental to the commonwealth;" and again, "many felonies are not so enormous offences as perjury, and therefore to stifle a prosecution for perjury seems to be a greater offence than compounding some felonies." This case must, therefore, be looked upon as supportable, if at all, on its own peculiar facts. Fallows v. Taylor, 7 T. R. 476, is in favour of the right of the plaintiff to maintain this action. There certain magistrates had directed prosecutions for a public nuisance in a river; the plaintiff, by their order, had prepared bills of indictment against the defendant, who in order to avoid the expense of the indictment entered into the bond on which the action was brought to remove the nuisance, and the Court of Queen's Bench held the withdrawing the prosecutions to be a lawful consideration for the bond. In Edgewood v. Rodd, 5 East, 294, which will perhaps be cited on the other side, a penalty would have been incurred, on conviction, to the use of the Crown, and it was therefore not competent to the defendants to do any act tending to deprive the Crown of its security for the payment of the penalty (see argument, 5 East, 296); that case must likewise, if not distinguishable on the ground suggested, be considered as overruled by Rex v. Crisp, supra. Pool v. Bousfield, 1 Camp. 55, was only a nisi prius decision, and as such not entitled to much weight. Then Beetley v. Wingfield, 11 East, 46; Baker v. Townsend, 7 Taunt. 422; Elworthy v. Bird, 2 Sim. & Stu. 372; and Kirk v. Strickwood, 4 B. & Ad. 421, are direct authorities for the plaintiff. In order to avoid a contract such as that on which the present action is brought, it must on the face of it appear to be necessarily illegal (Comyn on Contracts, 2nd ed. 23, 24). Now circumstances may be supposed which would have certainly made this agreement perfectly legal; for instance, if while the prosecution was pending a civil action had been brought by the plaintiff, even if the indictment had actually been found, the Attorney-General would, according to the case of Rex v. Fielding, 2 Burr. 720, have granted a nolle pros. upon such indictment, and for this position The Mayor of York v. Pilkington, 2 Atkyns, 302, is an authority, and from Elworthy v. Bird, 2 Bing. 258, it seems that a discontinuance of the prosecution may be effected either by means of the Attorney-General or by calling the defendant into Court, and omitting to adduce evidence against him, and thus procuring an acquittal. He likewise cited Holland v. Hall, 1 B. & Ald. 53; Haines v. Busk, 5 Taunt. 521; Sevell v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 4 Taunt. 856; Harrington v. Klopogge, 2 Bro. and Bing. 678 (note), as authorities to shew that in order to invalidate an agreement on the ground of illegality, it must be shewn not merely to be prima facie illegal, but necessarily so.

Martin, Q.C. for the defendants in error.—Even if the distinction contended for, viz. between misdemeanours which are in their nature analogous to felonies, and those for which there is a remedy by action, be correct, yet the application of the argument for the plaintiff in this case would be fatal to the maintenance of the action, for the indictment was for an assault on a peace officer, and for a riot, and for these offences no redress could have been had by civil action. Neither can it be said that the Court had any power on the trial to assent to the compromise entered into between the prosecutor and the defendants, for this agreement being in itself illegal, could not be rendered legal by the judge. If an agreement like the present is to be upheld on the supposition that the Attorney-General might have sanctioned the entry of a nolle prosequi, an agreement not to offer evidence on an indictment for murder might likewise be held valid. The cases of Holland v. Hall, 1 B. & Ald. 53; and Haines v. Busk, 5 Taunt. 521, are quite correct. Elworthy v. Bird, 2 Bing. 258, and The Mayor of York v. Pilkington, 2 Atk. 302, have no bearing on the present question. Jones v. Waite, 5 B. N. C. 341, shews that any agreement contrary to the policy of the law is illegal, and that this is the true test, and not that suggested on behalf of the plaintiff. Then the case of Garth v. Earnshaw, 3 Yo. & Coll. 584, shews that such a compromise as this would be illegal, and if so, the consideration being bad in part, is bad altogether. (1 Smith's Leading Cases, 154, 169; Com. Dig. Action on the case upon assumpsit, Deb. 7.) Then it is clear on examination that no case cited on the other side shews that an indictment for a riot and assault can be compromised, and Collins v. Blantern, 2 Wils. 341, is an express authority that no action can be maintained on an agreement to compound a misdemeanor. Chitt. Contr. 3rd edit. 674, is an authority to the same effect.

Bliss, in reply.—There is no averment in this plea that the act of withdrawing the indictment, or rather of not giving evidence, was done illegally, and this need not necessarily have been the case. In Jones v. Waite, 5 B. N. C. 341, the agreement must have been illegal, and in Garth v. Earnshaw, 3 Yo. & Coll. 584, the contract was held illegal upon other grounds than those here suggested on behalf of the defendants.

JUDGMENT.

TINDAL, C.J. now (June 13) gave judgment as follows:—This was an action on an agreement, by which the defendants in consideration (inter alia) that the plaintiff being the prosecutor of an indictment preferred against certain persons for an assault and riot would not proceed further on such indictment, undertook and promised the plaintiff to pay him a certain amount of money. The declaration averred that in pursuance of such agreement the plaintiff did not proceed further with the indictment, and, with the assent of the then defendants, informed the Court before which the indictment was pending of the premises, and by leave of the Court forbore to give evidence, and the defendants were acquitted. The defendants pleaded several pleas to this action, but the most material plea is that which raises the question whether the consideration for the said supposed promise was illegal and the promise therefore void. On demurrer the Court of Queen's Bench held this to be so. The same question has been argued before us on the writ of error, and we think the judgment of the Queen's Bench was right. It seems clear from the various authorities brought before us on the argument that some misdemeanors are of such a nature that a contract to withdraw a prosecution in respect of them, and a consent to give no evidence against the parties, is founded on an illegal consideration. Such was the case of Collins v. Blantern, which was a prosecution for perjury. It is strange that a doubt as to the law in such a case should ever have been raised. A contrary decision would have placed it in the power of a private individual to make a profit to himself by doing a great public injury. It is difficult to comprehend the case of Johnson v. Ogilby, stated in 3 P. Williams, 277. There a prosecution for a fraud was suppressed, and the suppression was the consideration for the payment of a sum of money. The distinction between felony and misdemeanor seems to have been the foundation of the decision, but it was a distinction overruled in Collins v. Blantern. It is not, indeed, at all clear that the indictment for the fraud was compromised as a part of the agreement, or that the fraud was an indictable one; and perhaps the case may be so explained; if not, it cannot, we conceive, be sustained as law. In Drage v. Ibberson Lord Kenyon adverted to, and stated that he should adhere to, the class of cases which hold that the consideration for an act being the settling of a misdemeanor might be good in law. Thus a settlement of an indictment for a nuisance preferred by public authorities was held to be a lawful consideration for a bond binding the defendant to remove the nuisance: we presume on the ground which, however, is not very satisfactory, that the main object of the prosecution, the removal of the nuisance, was thereby effected; but the Court seem to have overlooked the consideration that the defendant who had infringed a public right was thereby entirely free from the punishment due to the violation of the public law. In Edgcombe v. Rodd, Le Blanc, J. assigns this as a reason for the consideration being illegal. "This," he observes, "was a prosecution for a public misdemeanor, and not for any private injury to the prosecutor." It is difficult to reconcile this principle, which we think a just one, with the case of Fallowes v. Taylor, 7 T. R. 475. In Pool v. Boussfield, 1 Camp. 55, the forbearing to apply to the Court to compel the defendant to answer the matter of certain affidavits was held to be an illegal consideration for the defendant's promise; but there is a class of cases, such as Beeley v. Wingfield, 11 East, 46, and Baker v. Townsend, 7 Taunt. 422, which do not at all break in upon sound principles. Those are cases where the private rights of the injured party are made the subject of the agreement, and where, by the previous conviction of the defendant, the rights of the public are also preserved inviolate. As Gibbs, C. J. in the latter case, well observes, "The parties have referred nothing but what they had a right to refer; they have referred the several assaults." By which we understand the learned judge to mean their several rights to damages in respect of those assaults. "The reference of all matters in dispute refers all other their civil rights, which may well be referred;" which words shew such interpretation to be correct. The case of Beeley v. Wingfield was after conviction; and the promissory note seems merely to have been given for the expenses of the prosecution, and was obviously part of the punishment inflicted by the Court after conviction. Indeed, it is very remarkable what very little authority there is to be found—rather consisting of dicta than decisions for the principle that any compromise of a misdemeanor, or, indeed, of any public offence, can be otherwise than illegal, and a promise made upon such a consideration otherwise than void. If the matter were res integra, we should have no doubt upon the point. We have no doubt that in all offences which involve damages to the injured party for which he may maintain an action, it is competent for him, notwithstanding that they are also of a public nature, to compromise or settle his private damage in any manner he may think fit. It is said, indeed, in the case of an assault, he may also undertake not to prosecute on behalf of the public. It may be so; but we are not disposed to extend this any further. In the case before us, the compromise was of an assault and riotous obstruction of a public officer in the execution of his duty; and in no case has it been said that it is lawful to compromise a prosecution for such an offence. Where the judge at the trial sanctions the compromise of an indictment, the exact words used by him are material, for he cannot make legal that which the law declares to be illegal. We entirely agree in the observations of the Court of Queen's Bench as to this part of the case, and we think the judgment given by them must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Bankrupt and Insolvent Courts.

COURT OF REVIEW.

July 1 and 2.

Ex parte PARSON, Re FIDGER.

Costs—Fiat upon bankrupt's petition.

Where a fiat had been issued upon the petition of the bankrupt, and upon the choice of assignees, they appointed another solicitor, the costs of the bankrupt's solicitor up to the choice of assignees were, under the circumstances of the case, allowed out of the estate, but the Court declined to lay down any general rule on the subject.

The petitioner in this case was a solicitor, and had been employed by the bankrupt in suing out the fiat against him upon his own petition under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 41. Assignees having been chosen, they appointed their own solicitor, and this petition was presented to have the costs of the petitioner paid out of the estate.

Swanston, for the assignees, opposed.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—I entirely approve of the course the Commissioner has taken in having this brought before the Court; but I think, under the circumstances of this case, these costs may be allowed, though I do not mean to lay down any general rule.

Tuesday, July 7.

Ex parte TURNER, Re OSBORN.

Opening fiat—Fiat issued on bankrupt's petition.

Where a fiat had been issued under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 41, upon the petition of the bankrupt, but the same had not been opened within the time required by the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 4, the Court, upon the petition of a creditor, gave liberty to proceed upon the fiat.

In this case the fiat had been issued on the 2nd of July, on the petition of the bankrupt himself, under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 41, but up to the date of the petition the fiat had not been opened, as required by the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 4, in the case of a fiat issued upon the petition of a creditor. This petition was therefore presented by some of the creditors, praying that the fiat might be annulled, and a new fiat issued upon their petition.

Glasse, for the petitioners, called the attention of the Court to the words of the 41st section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, which, after providing for the mode of proceeding to adjudication where the fiat had been issued on the bankrupt's petition, continued, "and all further proceedings under such fiat shall be thenceforth prosecuted and carried on in like manner as if such fiat had been issued and adjudicated upon on the petition of a creditor of the bankrupt." There being no adjudication in this case, the petition prayed that a new fiat should be issued, instead of applying to have the fiat opened in the manner provided by the 4th section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, as by the terms of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, that section did not appear to be applicable to this case.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—On the assumption that if the fiat had been issued by a creditor instead of the bankrupt himself, there would have been a default, I think I could give you the order you would then have been entitled to.

Order made accordingly.

Wednesday July 15.

(Before Mr. Commissioner FONBLANQUE.)

Re BARTLETT.

An attorney who engages in the business of a bill discount will not be entitled to his certificate, even though unopposed by creditors.

The bankrupt was an attorney who had been largely engaged in discounting bills. He had also been the promoter of a distillery company, most of whose directors had run away. He had been entitled to some reversionary property. His profits were stated at 1,400*l.* a year; and his losses were chiefly in bad book debts and bad bills. His accounts had passed unopposed by any of his creditors. He now applied for his certificate.

Sturgeon, on behalf of Mrs. Casse, one of the creditors, opposed the granting of the certificate.

The bankrupt was subjected to a long examination, in which he admitted the above facts.

Cor. for the bankrupt, contended that his youth and inexperience were his excuse: that he was charged with no frauds upon his clients, and with no extravagant expenditure. He had been the victim of others. Of all his creditors, the only opposing one was a person who had been the main instrument of his ruin, and who had been summoned, but did not appear.

Mr. Commissioner FONBLANQUE said that there was no greater pest of society than a bill discounting attorney. In this case, fortunately for the bankrupt, there was no charge of unfair dealings with clients, or of extravagance. Still it was due to the respectable portion of a profession, whose character and position it was of the utmost importance to maintain, that transactions of this sort, so unworthy of an attorney, should not pass unrebuked and unpunished. He should, therefore, withhold the certificate for eighteen months.

Re LITTON.

Residence within the Court District.

An insolvent had been in France for fifteen weeks preceding his petition.—Held, not to have had continuous residence within the Court district for twelve months, as required by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 1.

Insolvent had resided some years within the jurisdiction of the Court, but had quitted it, gone to France, and had remained there fifteen weeks from November last. It was objected by James, for a creditor, that by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 1, it was required that an insolvent petitioning the Court "shall have resided within the district during the twelve months next preceding" the presentation of his petition, and that this insolvent had not done.

Cooke, for the insolvent.

Mr. Commissioner FAWC said, that two questions arose—first, what was the meaning of the Act; and, secondly, whether the petitioner had resided within the district? As to the first, it was his opinion the twelve months meant twelve months next preceding the presentation of the petition, and must be substantially a continuous residence. As to the second point, he thought that although an absence from the jurisdiction for a moderate time for a purpose connected with business, or even pleasure, with the intention of returning, would not deprive the insolvent of his right to petition, yet that so long an absence as fifteen weeks was fatal. If any circumstances connected with the recovery of health, or affording any other explanation, could have been laid before the Court, it might have removed the difficulty. No such case was shewn, and therefore he dismissed the petition for want of jurisdiction, and directed that an order made for the insolvent's release from custody to certain executions should be vacated.

THE LEGISLATOR.

Summary.

It will be seen that legislation is not to be stayed altogether for this session. Ministers adopt the Poor Removal Bill of their predecessors, with some trifling alterations, and intend to press it. The Charitable Trusts Bill, not Lord LYNDHURST's, but Mr. HUME's—a sort of stop-gap till a more efficient one can be found—has been read a second time, and will pass the Commons, though its fate in the Lords is uncertain. Then there has been a talk about the Small Debts Bill. It is not abandoned, although there is not the slightest prospect of making it law during this session. But from the tone of the discussion it is obvious that a measure of the sort is inevitable, and cannot long be delayed. We trust, therefore, that before the next session a vigorous attempt will be made to procure a really efficient one in the shape of the scheme propounded here some months since for remodelling the Quarter Sessions Courts; or, at least, something like it. We have not heard a word of the probable fate of the Conveyancing Bill. It appears to be passing sub silentio by common consent, not a lawyer in the House to watch its progress or to anatomise it, still less to urge the claims of the Solicitors to compensation in the shape of abolished certificate duty and protection against interlopers, exempt office from their education and their taxes.

FRIDAY.—Since the above was in type the Premier has announced the purposes of the Government. The Small Debts Bill is, we regret to find, to be pressed forward this session, when it will be impossible that it can receive the attention due to the importance of the changes it introduces. It will, we fear, become law with all its imperfections, and henceforth be an obstacle by the new interests it will create to a more efficient measure. If the Lawyers find the new courts the nuisance we anticipate, they will only have themselves to blame; they have not used ordinary exertions to shew the Parliament the mischief of the present measure, and that which is equally necessary, a better one as a substitute. Mere dogged opposition to a change will not do now-a-days. It is necessary to accompany an objection to one scheme by some other shewing how the same end may be attained with more of certainty or less of evil. It is to their neglect of this rule of modern legislative warfare that the Lawyers are so helpless in Parliament. May they learn wisdom by their better experience, and, when they have an advocate in the House of Commons, instruct him not merely to oppose but to propose. They will then be heard with respect, and might make good compromises and obtain compensation, neither of which do they now procure.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE'S SALARY.

TUESDAY, July 14.—Lord BROUGHAM said he regretted the absence of the noble marquis (the Marquis of Lansdowne), inasmuch as he wished to call attention to a subject which he was sorry to be obliged to mention. He wished to give a general notice of his intention to submit to their lordships' consideration an important question, which was now peculiarly pressed upon them on account of the acceptance (although he believed the appointment was not as yet completed) by his learned friend, Serjeant Wilde, of the lord chief justiceship of the Court of Common Pleas. One of the Acts which he deeply lamented he had ever permitted to pass their lordships' House when he had the honour of holding the great seal, was that to which he was now about to refer. That most improper and wholly unconstitutional proceeding, however, did take place at the time he had the honour of holding office. He did not mean but to say that he was in some degree responsible for that measure which allowed the salary of the Lord Chief Justice, to whom the Act of Parliament gave 10,000*l.* a year, and which Lord Tenterden was entitled to enjoy during his life, to be reduced to 8,000*l.* a year. Their lordships permitted that act to be done, though they should never have consented to it. His lordship's executors—and, if he were one of them, he should hope he would not survive it—were entitled, he could shew, to receive the 2,000*l.* which Lord Tenterden had abstained from taking. It was not a permissive Act, nor one giving power to the Treasury to make such a reduction. It was wholly unconstitutional to make any learned judge dependent upon the mercy of the Treasury. The Acts of the 6 George 4, caps. 82 and 84 (the latter applying to the Common Pleas, to which his learned friend Serjeant Wilde is appointed Lord Chief Justice), gave 10,000*l.* a year to the one Chief Justice, and 8,000*l.* a year to the other, payable by quarterly payments to themselves out of the Consolidated Fund of Great Britain. He must remind the house of this fact, and observe how monstrous it would be because a government was pleased to make a bargain with one Lord Chief Justice, by which he was to take less than he was really entitled to receive, and the residue to be paid into the Consolidated Fund—how monstrous it would be to continue the same course in respect to other chief justices, and perhaps go still further, and say that they should have 6,000*l.* instead of 10,000*l.* and then to dole to them an increased 500*l.* a year, according as these learned judges behaved to the satisfaction of the Crown? He hoped and trusted that something would be done to amend this defect in their proceedings. He had not seen any Act that had passed on this subject since the 6th Geo. 4, although he had certainly an impression on his mind that some Act of the kind had passed their lordships' house. He had abstained from bringing this question before the House at an earlier period only because his noble and learned friend the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench had entreated him not to bring it forward. A judge more utterly beyond all possibility of being influenced by such considerations than his noble and learned friend had never existed, and a man caring less about money than the present Lord Chief Justice was not to be found in the Queen's dominions. That, however, was no reason why he should now abstain from bringing this subject forward, when, perhaps, they would have a repetition of the same traffic. Such a proceeding he thought was greatly to be reprobated—namely, that of giving a lower salary than the Act of Parliament declared ought to be given.—Earl GREY said that the subject to which the noble and learned lord had called their attention was certainly one of great importance. He understood that a certain arrangement had taken place a few years ago upon this subject, and it had been carried into effect in the manner referred to by the noble and learned lord. Their lordships would remember that in 1830 a committee of the other House of Parliament recommended a revision of the offices of the executive government, and in respect to the judicial officers an arrangement was made for a reduction of the salaries. He was very sorry, if his noble and learned friend thought that this arrangement was so objectionable, that he did not then adopt that simple and easy course of passing an Act of Parliament refusing their lordships' sanction to this arrangement, which was originally suggested by a committee of the other House of Parliament. In point of form it would have been, no doubt, better that such an Act was passed, but practically they had other modes of accomplishing the same object. He fully concurred with the noble and learned lord in the compliment he had paid to the character of the noble and learned Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench. He was sure that no government holding office in this country would or could be guilty of such an abuse of power as his noble and learned friend thought possible, because, in point of fact, the actual payment that would, under such circumstances, be made, would appear in the finance accounts, and would, of course, attract the attention of the public, by whom it would undoubtedly be condemned. Any practical abuse of this power would, therefore, be altogether impossible. The noble and learned lord was, however, himself charged with this especial business at the time this arrangement was made (“no, no,” from Lord Brougham). It was the noble and learned lord's peculiar and special province to look after this matter.—Lord BROUGHAM.—I was not told of it at the time. I knew nothing about it. I was, no doubt, cognizant of the arrangement; but it was a week after it was made.—Earl GREY.—The noble and learned lord surely must have known all about it when the report of the Ashburton committee was made to the House, recommending the salaries of the judges to be reduced. When Lord Denman was appointed to his present office the subject was adverted to in this house, and the necessity of the reduction of the salary taking place in conformity with the recommendation of the committee was then insisted upon. The noble and learned lord was himself Lord Chancellor at the time, and must of course have been aware of this proceeding. It was, he thought, with his noble and learned friend's cognizance that this arrangement had taken place. It was his (Lord Brougham's) business more than that of any other member of this house, if the arrangement were wrong, to have it at once corrected. If there was a necessity for bringing in an Act to regulate the salaries of the Chief Justice, he had no doubt the government would do so.—Lord BROUGHAM begged, in the first place, to say that he had not addressed the noble earl; he had addressed himself to those who were higher in office, and who, consequently, might be supposed to know more of the matter than the noble earl (a laugh). He trusted, for the sake of regularity, that such scenes would not take place in future in that House, that when a noble lord declared upon his honour that he did not know a certain matter, the noble earl should get up and say, "But I know that you did know" (laughter). He trusted such was not the course which the noble marquis at the head of the present government in that house would pursue. The noble earl said he must have known the matter, and why? Because he was Lord Chancellor at the time, meaning, he presumed, that he was likely to have known it. He did not understand the distinction drawn by the noble earl between the Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench and the Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas. Undoubtedly, something ought to be done. He had inquired of the Chief Justice whether he knew any thing of the cutting down of his salary to 7,000*l.* per annum; and he understood from him that he was no party to any arrangement of the kind, and he doubted very much whether the Chief Justice would accept it, giving up a very large private practice.—Lord CAMPBELL thought it was the imperative duty of his noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Brougham), who was Lord Chancellor at the time, to have carried out the recommendations that were made to reduce the salary of the Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench to 8,000*l.* and that of the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas to 7,000*l.* per annum. So far as he understood his noble and learned friend, he had taken to himself a portion of the blame for not having carried out those recommendations.—After a few words from Lord BROUGHAM, in explanation, the LORD CHANCELLOR said it was quite clear that either the salary should remain at 10,000*l.* a year, or that there should be an Act of Parliament to reduce it to 8,000*l.* His noble and learned friend said that there was an implied understanding between the Government and the Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas; so far as he was aware nothing of the kind had taken place. The present Chief Justice had taken the office with all the emoluments belonging to it.

JUVENILE OFFENDERS BILL.

The Marquis of WESTMINSTER moved the second reading of this bill pro forma, on the understanding that if the Government should decline to take up the subject he should be at liberty to introduce a bill on the subject at an early period next session.—The Earl of DEVON approved of the principle of the bill, but wished to extend its operation to others besides juvenile offenders.—Lord CAMPBELL had the authority of the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench for stating his entire approval of the principle of the bill. He, at the same time, was desirous of extending the summary mode provided by the measure to all offences of a certain mitigated description. There could be no doubt that the distinction between felonies and trespasses in certain cases was sufficiently fantastical, and he therefore rejoiced exceedingly that the noble marquis had taken up the subject, and would promise him all the assistance which it was in his power to afford.—The LORD CHANCELLOR thought that the noble marquis had taken a wise course, inasmuch as it would be impossible to give so important and difficult a subject due consideration at the present advanced period of the session. Of course their lordships could not expect him to express any opinion as to the remedy to be applied, but the existence of the evil to be remedied was not to be denied.

The bill was then read a second time pro forma.

SMALL DEBTS BILL.

THURSDAY, July 16.—The LORD CHANCELLOR, after presenting petitions from the clergy of Leicester against the Union of the Sees of St. Asaph and Bangor, and from Moira, in the county of Down, praying for the total abolition of capital punishment, stated that he had looked into the Bill for the Better Recovery of Small Debts, which had been introduced by the late President of the Council (the Duke of Buccleuch), and he intended to take an early day for moving its second reading.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

COUNTY OF SOMERSET SMALL DEBTS BILL.

WEDNESDAY, July 15.—Mr. DICKINSON wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government to go on with this Bill, or whether, as seemed to be the impression in some quarters, they would put it aside in order to introduce some general legislation on the subject. In order to ascertain that fact, he would now move that the Bill be read a second time.—Sir G. GREY hoped the hon. member would not press his motion for the second reading. This was one of some Bills which had been stopped by the late Government for the purpose of introducing some general measure as to local courts. There was no doubt but that that Government would support such a general Bill if brought forward, and he hoped that her Majesty's present Government would even in the present session be able to get such a measure as that through. Many of the objections which had existed to general legislation on the subject had been removed, and there was now a more general concurrence as to the advantages of such a measure than had existed at any former period. It was known that the late Government had prepared a Bill on the subject, and that Bill was at present under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor; but from its voluminous nature, and from the fact of the noble and learned lord having been in possession of the seals only a few days, it was impossible to go through it with that attention necessary to so important a measure; he hoped, nevertheless, that the Government would be able to introduce that measure with some modifications, even in the present session, but, if not, he hoped that they would be able to do so early in the next. Under these circumstances he trusted that the hon. member would not press his motion.—Mr. DICKINSON said he had heard no good ground why he should not press his motion. If this Bill were carried, its provisions would, of course, give way to general legislation on the subject.—Mr. B. ESCOTT concurred with the right hon. baronet (Sir G. Grey) that his hon. friend ought not to press his motion at present, but he hoped that some general measure with respect to local courts would be introduced, and that in that would be included some provision for establishing ecclesiastical courts.—Mr. H. BAKERLEY said that he had the strongest objection to this bill, which amongst other things would render nugatory some of the most important provisions of a Bill which had passed last year, called the Small Debts Bill.—Mr. ACLAND hoped that if this Bill were given up the Government would give some assurance as to what they intended with respect to general legislation on the subject.—Sir G. GREY stated, that the general feeling of the last as well as the present Government was in favour of this Bill, and he repeated the hope that even in the present session a general measure on the present subject would be brought forward and carried through; but it would be impossible to state at present the details of such a measure. The Bill already prepared by the late Government contained about 130 clauses, and he repeated, that time had not existed for their due examination since he took the seals.—Sir J. GRAHAM hoped and believed that her Majesty's Government would introduce some measure on the subject in the present session. The Bill prepared might, in fact, be considered as the labour of seven or eight years. The clerks in most of the small debt courts had been examined, and pains had been taken to meet their various objections, which he might say had now been altogether obviated. The patient attention of some of the most able and intelligent lawyers had been given to all its details. If the attention of his hon. and learned friend the Attorney-General, whom he then saw in his place, were directed to the Bill, he would find that extreme attention had been paid to the subject. All the parties who were connected with the Bill before the House had been duly informed that a general measure would be brought forward relative to it. He considered the present Bill as entirely too comprehensive for a local measure.—Mr. SPOONER hoped that the Government would press the bill in the present session, as it was absolutely necessary for the benefit of small traders, to enable them to collect their debts.—Mr. ESCOTT hoped his hon. friend would withdraw his motion, in order to let the subject be one of general legislation. It would be of the greatest importance to all persons engaged in trade.—Mr. DICKINSON said that he would give way to the general feeling of the House, and not press his motion.

POOR REMOVAL BILL.

Captain PECHELL wished to know what were the intentions of Government with respect to the motion for the Pauper Removal Bill, which stood on the orders for to-morrow. It would be very satisfactory to know the course which the right hon. gentleman the Secretary of State would pursue.—Sir G. GREY said, according to the statement of his noble friend the First Lord of the Treasury the other night, he would ask the House to-morrow (Thursday) to go into committee on the Bill. The course he proposed to follow was this, to take up the Bill as it stood, to pass it though the committee pro forma, and to ask the House to agree to the first eight clauses of the Bill. The Bill consisted of three parts; the first merely altered the law as to the removal of paupers, the second related to the trial of appeals, and the latter part of the Bill, which had been added since the instructions moved by the hon. member for Malton, and adopted by the House, related to union settlements. He proposed to omit the latter part of the Bill, and merely to ask the House to assent to that part which related to the removability of paupers. He hoped the course he proposed would render unnecessary the amendments contemplated by hon. members.

CHARITABLE TRUSTS.

Mr. HUME then moved the second reading of the Charitable Trusts Bill. The principle of it was to secure the accountability of persons entrusted with the funds of public charities.—Sir G. GREY would not oppose the second reading of the Bill. He cautioned the House, however, against supposing that this was a substitute for the Bill which had been thrown out in the House of Lords, or for a more general measure.—After a few words from Mr. BROTHERTON and Mr. T. EGERTON, Mr. BERNAL warned Mr. Hume of the difficulties which he would have to encounter in carrying this measure, and recommended him to withdraw it, and to leave the whole subject in the hands of Government.—Mr. STAFFORD O'BRIEN concurred in the advice given by the last speaker to Mr. Hume, and protested against the principle that the House of Commons had a right to interfere with every charitable body. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.—Mr. BUCK seconded the amendment.—Mr. T. EGERTON tendered his thanks to Mr. Hume for the introduction of this Bill, and hoped that the House, with the knowledge of the abuses in the management of our charities, would read it a second time.—Mr. SPOONER contended that a measure of such importance as the present could not receive adequate consideration at this advanced period of the session.—Sir DE LACY EVANS supported the bill as a preliminary step to clear the way for some more comprehensive measure.—Mr. ESCOTT considered this measure to be one of so grave a character as to require the Government to take it into its own hands. The present Bill appeared to him to be very crude, and not likely to effect the objects for which it was intended. He recommended Mr. Hume to withdraw it for the present, and to introduce it next session in a modified form.—Sir J. GRAHAM explained the circumstances under which he had assented to allow Mr. Hume to read this bill a first time. He also gave a brief exposition of the provisions of Lord Lyndhurst's Bill on this subject, and expressed his regret that it had been defeated in the other House of Parliament. He considered the object of the present Bill to be very desirable, and insisted that the general rule of accountability ought to be enforced.—After some observations from Mr. NEWDEGATE and Mr. T. EGERTON, and a short reply from Mr. HUME, which led to a declaration from Lord G. SOMERSET that he would vote for the second reading of the Bill, although he thought that great alterations must be made in it in committee, the House divided, when the second reading was carried by a majority of 42 over 12 votes.

MEASURES TO BE PROCEEDED WITH.

THURSDAY, July 16.—Lord J. RUSSELL.—I stated, Sir, that I would to-day inform the House of the general course which the Government propose to pursue with respect to several of the Bills now before this House, and I will do so in moving the consideration of the orders of the day. I wish, in the first place, to give notice that I will on Monday next state the plan of the Government with respect to the sugar duties. With respect to the Bills now before this House, the first, which comes under my consideration is the Poor Removal Bill. With regard to that Bill I have already stated my general views to the House, and my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department will presently state what is proposed to be done with regard to that Bill. The next is the Drainage Bill, which is a bill to facilitate the improvement of land. Some member of the Government will undertake that Bill with the object of carrying it through in the present Session. The next most important class of bills are those brought in by the noble lord who was lately the chief secretary of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. One of those, the Ejectment Bill, we propose to go on with (notwithstanding the shape it is in at present), making some alterations, but preserving the clause which prevents distressing on the growing crops. The Leases Bill we also propose to go on with. With regard to another Bill affecting Ireland, the Tenants' Compensation Bill, the machinery is extremely complicated; we wish to give further consideration to that Bill, with the view of seeing whether we can hope to pass it into a law. There are some other Bills affecting Ireland, with regard to which my right hon. friend, the chief secretary of the Lord Lieutenant, will be able to answer any inquiries which may be made on the subject; I don't see that there is any necessity for my noticing them at present. There are some Bills which are now in the House of Lords. One of them is called the Small Debts' Bill, which is similar to one which was introduced by a former Government, and by the late government, the subject of which has been repeatedly before the House. The present Government entirely approve of the general purposes of that Bill, and although it is a Bill of great length, and containing many clauses, they hope they may be able to obtain the consent of Parliament to that Bill, it being one of great importance. There is another Bill which is likewise, at present, in the House of Lords, which the Government do not propose to take into their own hands, unless it should be necessary, which I trust also will obtain the assent of Parliament, namely, the Religious Opinions Bill. That was introduced by a member of the late Government, as a Government Bill, and I trust the author of that Bill will continue to take charge of it; but if he should be of opinion that he cannot do that, some member of the present Government will continue it in the shape in which it at present stands. There are many other Bills which are not bills of great importance, which we propose to go on with.

NEW STATUTES

Of the Session 9 Victoria.

CAP. XXVII.

An Act to amend the Laws relating to Friendly Societies. (July 3, 1846.)

This statute, as of universal interest, we present entire.

1. 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 40. Purposes for which societies may be formed under 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, and 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 40.—Whereas by an Act passed in the fifth year of the reign of his late Majesty, intituled, "An Act to amend an Act of the Tenth Year of his late Majesty King George the Fourth, to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to Friendly Societies," it is enacted, that it shall and may be lawful for any number of persons in Great Britain and Ireland to form themselves into and to establish a society, under the provisions of the said recited Act, for the mutual relief and maintenance of all and every the members thereof, their wives, children, relations, or nominees, in sickness, infancy, advanced age, widowhood, or any other natural state or contingency whereof the occurrence is susceptible of calculation by way of average, or for any other purpose which is not illegal: and whereas doubts have been entertained for what purposes a society may be established under the provisions of the said Act, and it is expedient that such purposes be better defined: Be it enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that a society may be established, under the provisions of the said Acts, for any of the following purposes; (that is to say),

1. For the lawful insurance of money to be paid on the death of the members to their husbands, wives, or children, kindred or nominees, or for defraying the expenses of the burial of the members, their husbands, wives, or children; provided that no person under the age of six shall be allowed to become a member of such society, and that no insurance shall be effected on the life of any child under six years of age;

2. For the relief, maintenance, or endowment of the members, their husbands, wives, children, kindred, or nominees, in infancy, old age, sickness, widowhood, or any other natural state of which the probability may be calculated by way of average;

3. Toward making good any loss sustained by the members by fire, flood, or shipwreck, or by any contingency of which the probability may be calculated by way of average, whereby they shall have sustained any loss or damage of their live or dead stock, or goods, or stock in trade, or of the tools or implements of their trade or calling;

4. For the frugal investment of the savings of the members for better enabling them to purchase food, firing, clothes, or other necessaries, or the tools or implements of their trade or calling, or to provide for the education of their children or kindred, with or without the assistance of charitable donations: provided always, that the shares in any such investment society shall not be transferable, and that the investment of each member shall accumulate or be employed for the sole benefit of the member investing, or the husband, wife, children, or kindred of such member, and that no part thereof shall be appropriated to the relief, maintenance, or endowment of any other member or person whomsoever, and that the full amount of the balance due according to the rules of such society to such member shall be paid to him or her on withdrawing from the society, and that no such last-mentioned society shall be entitled or allowed to invest its funds, or any part thereof, with the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt;

5. For any other purpose which shall be certified to be legal in England or Ireland by her Majesty's Attorney or Solicitor-General, and in Scotland by the Lord Advocate, and which shall be allowed by one of her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State as a purpose to which the powers and facilities of the said Acts ought to be extended; provided that the amount of the sum or value of the benefit to be assured to any member, or any person claiming by or through him or her, by any society for any purpose so certified and allowed as hereinbefore mentioned, shall not exceed in the whole two hundred pounds; and that this limitation shall be inserted in the rules of every society established for any purpose so certified and allowed; and that no such last-mentioned society shall be entitled or allowed to invest its funds or any part thereof with the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt.

2. Member may withdraw from society, the rules of which do not prescribe the time, &c. on giving notice, and paying all arrears.—And be it declared and enacted, That any member of a friendly society, the rules of which do not prescribe the time when or the conditions on which members shall be allowed to withdraw themselves, shall be allowed to withdraw himself or herself at any time from such society on giving written notice to the secretary or other proper officer of the society of his or her intention to do so, and on payment of all arrears due by such member; but after giving such notice as aforesaid no member shall be entitled to have any benefit from the funds of the society, or be liable to any further subscription or payment other than the amount of the arrears due from him or her at the time of giving such notice.

3. Payments to society shall be kept distinct for each purpose subscribed for, or extra payments made for contingencies.—That when a society is formed, under the provisions of the said Acts or this Act, for any purpose in addition to that of providing relief, maintenance, or endowment, in case of infancy, old age, sickness, widowhood, or other natural state as aforesaid, the contributions or payments for every such other purpose shall be kept separate and distinct, or the charges defrayed by extra subscriptions of the members, at the time such contingencies take place.

4. Separate accounts to be kept for each particular benefit subscribed for.—That the rules of every Friendly Society established after the passing of this Act shall provide that a book or books be kept, in which all monies received or paid on account of any particular fund or benefit for which the rules of the society provide shall be entered in a separate account, distinct from the monies received and paid on account of any other benefit or provision.

5. Returns of the rates of sickness and mortality, assets and liabilities, shall be sent by every society to the registrar of friendly societies every five years.—That the returns of the rate of sickness and mortality required by law to be sent by every friendly society at intervals of five years to the barrister or advocate by whom the rules of the society may have been certified shall be henceforth sent to the registrar of friendly societies in England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively, according to such form as shall be prepared for that purpose by the said several registrars under the direction of one of her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State; and with every such return shall be sent a report of the assets and liabilities of such society; and this provision shall be inserted in the rules of every society which shall be established after the passing of this Act.

6. Penalties for not making returns to the registrar required by law.—That the treasurers, trustees, stewards, or other principal officer of every such society, who by the rules of such society are or is bound to prepare or cause to be prepared the yearly general statement of the funds and effects of such society, shall be the persons who shall be respectively bound to make or cause to be made, and to send to the registrar of friendly societies the said returns of the rate of sickness and mortality, and the said report of the assets and liabilities of such society; and every such person who shall refuse or wilfully neglect to make or cause to be made or to send the said returns of sickness or mortality, or the said report of the assets and liabilities of such society, at the time and in the manner prescribed by the said Acts or this Act, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding the sum of five pounds, to be recovered, with costs, before any two justices of the peace having jurisdiction where such society shall have its place of meeting; and on nonpayment thereof, the same, with the reasonable costs of conviction, shall be levied by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the offender or offenders by warrant under the hand and seal of such justices.

An Act to facilitate the Dissolution of certain Railway Companies. (3rd July, 1846.)

The provisions of this statute being of extensive but not of general interest, we present only the more important sections entire; the regulations as to matters of form would not, of course, be adopted without reference to the Act itself.

1. Persons who shall have entered into a contract for the forming of a company for making a railway, &c. may dissolve the same pursuant to this Act.—Whereas it is expedient to facilitate the dissolution of certain railway companies as hereafter mentioned, and to afford facilities for the winding the up concerns of such companies: May it therefore please your Majesty that it may be enacted; and be it enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That when any persons or companies, before the passing of this Act, shall have entered into any contract usually called a subscription contract, or any other agreement or agreements, in writing or otherwise, for the formation of a company or partnership for making any railway which cannot be carried into execution without obtaining the authority of Parliament, and in respect of which an Act shall not before the passing of this Act have been obtained, it shall be lawful for such persons or companies to dissolve the said company or partnership, contract or agreement, in manner hereinafter mentioned, and that whether or not such contract or agreement shall contain any powers or provisions for dissolution of the company or partnership intended to be thereby formed: provided, nevertheless, that nothing herein contained shall prevent any such persons or companies from exercising any such power or provision for dissolution in their contract or agreement contained, if they shall see fit, at any time before availing themselves of the powers in this Act contained: provided, also, that the provisions of this Act shall be taken to apply to any contract or partnership for the making any railway, notwithstanding that the agreement or partnership may relate to any other objects in connection therewith; and (unless a separate capital and separate subscription shall exist as regards the different objects) then, on a dissolution under the provisions of this Act, the dissolution shall extend to the whole objects of the contract or partnership.

2. Committee, &c. may call meetings of shareholders to consider dissolution.—That it shall be lawful for the committee, provisional directors, or other persons by such contract or agreement as aforesaid intrusted with the management and carrying into effect of the undertaking, and who are hereinafter called "the committee," to call a meeting of the shareholders for the purpose of determining whether the partnership or company so as aforesaid intended to be formed (and which is hereinafter called "the company") shall be dissolved; and that if such meeting shall determine, as after mentioned, that the company shall be dissolved, then as from the date of the resolution come to at such meeting, the company shall be taken to be dissolved, and the committee shall not have power to proceed any farther with the undertaking.

3. Shareholders may require committee to call meeting, and in default may call it themselves.—That it shall be lawful for any five shareholders, as after defined, by writing under their hands, to require the committee to call a meeting for the purpose aforesaid; and that if the committee shall refuse or neglect, for six days after any such requisition shall have been left at the registered place of business of the company, as regards England and Ireland, and as regards Scotland, at the usual place of business, or shall have been served personally on any member of the committee, to call such meeting by notice as after mentioned, or if for any reason whatever such meeting shall not be convened and held in pursuance of the directions herein contained, it shall be lawful for any five shareholders to call such meeting; and after any such requisition shall have been left or served as aforesaid, it shall not be lawful for the committee or any of them to make any payments out of the moneys of such company, except in discharge of bond fide debts or liabilities, or in performance of contracts or engagements, previously entered into, and in payment of the expenses of calling and holding such meeting or any adjourned meeting, nor to enter into any contracts or engagements on behalf of the company or affecting the property thereof, nor to issue any shares or scrip or representing the capital stock of such company, until the meeting called as aforesaid shall have determined the question of dissolution.

4. Meeting to be held duly called, although certain votes may be disallowed.—That the meeting shall be held to have been duly called, although the votes of the parties calling the same, or any of such votes, shall be disallowed at the meeting by the scrutineers to be appointed as hereinafter mentioned.

5. Notice of meeting to be by advertisement.—That the calling of any such meeting shall be by notice, signed either on behalf of the committee by any one member of the same, or in case the meeting shall be called by the shareholders, then by the shareholders calling the same, such notice to be advertised in the London Gazette eight clear days and not more than fifteen days before the time to be therein fixed for holding such meeting, and also within the before-mentioned limits as to time, in three London daily newspapers; that in the case of railways to be made in Ireland, the said notice shall also be advertised, within the before-mentioned limits as to time, in the Dublin Gazette and in two newspapers in common circulation in the city of Dublin; and as to railways to be made in Scotland, the said notice shall also be advertised, within the before-mentioned limits as to time, in the Edinburgh Gazette, and in two newspapers in common circulation in the city of Edinburgh.

Then follow the regulations of the meetings, and of the voting. Of these, a short statement will suffice.

12. As to the right of parties entitled to vote at meetings of the shareholders.—That the only persons entitled to be present and vote at any such meeting as shareholders, by themselves or proxies, shall be those persons who shall for the time being be in possession of and produce certificates or receipts declaring parties entitled to shares in any company, or acknowledging the receipt of a deposit in such company, usually termed "scrip" or "receipts" for deposits on shares, and that notwithstanding the party in possession may not be the party to whom the same was originally granted, or that the same may not have been legally assigned to the party in possession, or notwithstanding the same may be possessed by the holder as a mere mortgagee, or in any other manner, or the same may be subject to any charge or lien, and which parties are by this Act called "shareholders;" provided that nothing herein contained shall authorize more than one vote, either for dissolution or bankruptcy, to be given in respect of the same share, notwithstanding any transfer or delivery of such share after a vote shall have been given in respect thereof.

13. Mode of voting.—That every shareholder shall, in voting on the questions of dissolution and bankruptcy, be entitled to one vote, by himself or proxy, in respect of every share held by him, or in respect of which scrip or receipts may have been issued or debts paid, and that all shareholders producing such shares, scrip, or receipts, shall be entitled to attend meetings and to appoint proxies according to the form contained in the schedule hereto annexed, or in some form to the like effect: Provided always, and be it enacted, that the first of any such party attending any such meeting shall not in anywise increase or alter, either in law or equity, his rights or liabilities.

Sec. 14. Proxies to be signed before a Master in Chancery in England, or Sheriff, &c. in Scotland.

15. Number of persons, &c. necessary to constitute a meeting. Majority must consist of at least three-fifths of the votes of persons present.—That to constitute a meeting under the provisions of this Act for the purpose of deciding on a dissolution or bankruptcy, persons representing at least one-third part of the shares in the undertaking actually issued or given, either as shares, scrip, or receipts, must be present and vote; and that for the purpose of effecting a dissolution, and as to bankruptcy, there must be either a majority of the votes of the whole scrip of the company issued as aforesaid, or at least three-fifths of the votes of persons present and voting, either as shareholders or proxies, in favour of the motion for dissolution, and for the bankruptcy, if so resolved on.

Sec. 18. No votes allowed except for scrip, &c. actually issued or given before 31st March, 1846. Mode of ascertaining the issues.

Sec. 19. Registrars of joint stock companies to require a return of issues, but the omission of the registrar to send notice is not to exempt the committee from penalties.

Sec. 20. Committees of projected railways in Scotland to lodge a return with the sheriff clerk of Edinburgh within twelve days from the passing of this Act.

Sec. 21. The sheriff clerk to give notice by advertisement for returns of issued scrip, &c. to be made.

Sec. 22. In default of return, the meeting may be called, which must represent one-third of the capital of the company.

23. Meeting to decide if dissolution taken to be an act of bankruptcy. Scotland exempted.—That, in addition to the question of dissolution, it shall be imperative on the meeting to decide whether such dissolution shall or shall not be taken to be an act of bankruptcy for the purpose of having the affairs of the company wound up under the provisions of the Act after-mentioned; but this provision shall not extend to the case of railways to be made in Scotland.

24. If meeting decide that affairs shall not be so wound up, &c. then they shall be wound up like ordinary partnerships.—That in case the meeting shall resolve that the affairs of the company shall not be so wound up, or in the case of a railway to be made in Scotland, if the majority shall resolve in favour of dissolution, then (subject to the power hereinafter given to the committee and to creditors of the company to petition for a fiat) the affairs of the said company shall be wound up according to the rules applicable to the dissolution of partnership undertakings, and as if the undertaking had been dissolved by mutual consent.

25. Dissolution not to affect rights of creditors.—Provided always, that the resolution to dissolve the company, or the actual dissolution thereof, shall not alter or affect the rights of creditors or other persons not being shareholders in the company, nor any engagements whatsoever which the committee may have entered into, and shall not affect any suits pending before the passing of this Act.

26. If proposal of dissolution rejected, no new meeting to be called for six months to consider the question.—That where any meeting called to consider the question of dissolution shall have determined the question of the dissolution of the company in the negative, no new meeting shall be called to consider the question of dissolution, or any matter relating thereto, until the lapse of six months from the day in which the question was last resolved in the negative.

27. Any three of the committee, or any creditor or creditors, may petition for a fiat in bankruptcy.—That it shall be lawful for any three of those who were of the committee of any company so dissolved, at any time after the dissolution thereof shall have been resolved, or for any creditor or creditors of such company to such amount as is now by law requisite to support a fiat in bankruptcy in England and Ireland, or a sequestration in Scotland, within three months after the dissolution thereof shall have been resolved, to petition that a fiat in bankruptcy may issue against such company if in England or Ireland, or that the estates of the company may be sequestrated if in Scotland.

28. On issuing of fiats, companies to be subject to the provisions of the Acts for winding up the affairs of joint stock companies. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 98.—That upon the production of a copy of the London Gazette, containing the resolution of any such meeting as aforesaid, whereby it shall be resolved that the dissolution of the company shall be an act of bankruptcy, or upon the petition of any three of the committee as aforesaid, or of any creditor under the last preceding clause, a fiat in bankruptcy shall issue against such company by the registered name or style of such company; and the company shall thereupon be deemed to be within the provisions of an Act passed in the seventh and eighth years of the reign of her present Majesty, intitled "An Act for facilitating the winding up of Joint-Stock Companies unable to meet their pecuniary Engagements;" and of another Act passed in the eighth and ninth years of the reign of her present Majesty, intitled "An Act to facilitate the winding up of Joint-Stock Companies in Ireland unable to meet their pecuniary Engagements," in all respects as if a fiat in bankruptcy had issued against it under the said Act before its dissolution; but this last provision not to extend to Scotland.

Sec. 29. Sequestration of estates of dissolved Scotch railway companies may be awarded.

30. As to new railways by incorporated companies.—That when any company for making any railway, actually incorporated before the passing of this Act, shall have agreed to form any new or other railway or an extension thereof, and in respect of which a new or further capital shall have been agreed to be raised or contributed, and shares as hereinbefore defined shall have been issued or otherwise appropriated, and deposits paid thereon, then such company or partnership (as regards the new undertaking) shall in all respects be considered as a company or undertaking within the provisions of this Act; and meetings shall be held, and shareholders entitled to shares as aforesaid in the new undertaking, shall in manner hereinbefore provided have power to dissolve such new undertaking, and to decide as to bankruptcy, in all respects as is provided with regard to the companies hereinbefore mentioned or defined.

31. Member against whom judgment shall have been recovered, to be repaid by contribution from other members, together with costs.—That where the dissolution of a company shall have been resolved under this Act, if judgment shall have been recovered, or shall afterwards be recovered in any action against any member of the committee for any debt due from such company or from such committee in respect of the undertaking, the member against whom such judgment shall have been recovered shall be entitled at law to a contribution from each of the other members of such committee towards the payment of the monies recovered by such judgment, and of all costs and expenses in relation thereto, of such a share of the whole amount of such monies, costs, and expenses, as would have been borne by such respective member upon an equal contribution by all the members of such committee, and may recover the contributions to which he may be so entitled, or any of them, by action or actions of debt, or on the case against all or any of such other members of such committee, but so that no such member shall be liable in any such action as aforesaid, for more than the share to which he shall respectively be liable to contribute under this provision.

32. After dissolution of company no action, &c. to be brought by any attorney, &c. until one month after bill of fees shall have been delivered. Courts may refer bills for taxation to taxing officers.—That after the dissolution of any company shall have been resolved under this Act, no action or suit shall be brought for the recovery of any fees, charges, or disbursements for any business done for such company by any attorney or solicitor, whether in his character of attorney or solicitor, or as agent or otherwise, until the expiration of one calendar month after a bill of such fees, charges, and disbursements, signed by the claimant, shall have been delivered to the committee or official assignee authorized to wind up the affairs of such company, or left at their or his place of business; and it shall be lawful for the Court of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, or Exchequer, or any judge of either of such courts, and they are respectfully hereby required, on the application of such committee or of such official assignee, to refer such bill to be taxed and settled by any taxing officer of the court in which such reference shall be made; and the Court or judge making such reference shall restrain the claimant from commencing any action or suit touching his demand pending such reference, and such taxing officer may take such evidence in relation to such bill as he may think fit; and the costs of such reference shall be paid according to the event of such taxation (that is to say), if such bill when taxed be less by a sixth part than the bill delivered, then the claimant shall pay such costs, and if the bill when taxed shall not be less by a sixth part than the bill delivered, then the party on whose application the reference shall have been made shall pay such costs, to be considered and allowed nevertheless as part of the costs, charges, and expenses of executing the trusts and powers of this Act; and every order to be made for such reference shall direct the officer to whom such reference shall be made to tax such costs of such reference to be so paid as aforesaid, and to certify what upon such reference shall be found to be due to or from such claimant in respect of such bill, and of the costs of such reference, and after such reference as aforesaid, no further or other sum than shall be so found due shall be recoverable in respect of such bill.

33. Interpretation of Act.—That the following words and expressions shall have the meanings hereby assigned to them respectively, so far as such meanings are not excluded by the context or subject-matter: (videlicet.)

The word "Month" shall mean calendar month:
The word "Person" shall include corporations.

THE MAGISTRATE.

Summary.

NOTHING has occurred to claim particular notice, save the prospect of a possible carrying of the amended Poor Removal Bill during the present session. The "Summary of Magistrates' Cases" has been unavoidably deferred, in consequence of the indisposition of the writer. It will be completed next week.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, directs that justices of the peace shall grant licenses to houses for the performance of stage plays, when such houses are beyond the limits of the Lord Chamberlain's jurisdiction, and that justices shall make suitable rules for insuring order and decency at the several theatres licensed by them. Having had occasion to act (not perform) under this statute, I drew the subjoined forms, the only ones of any moment, and submit them for the approval of your readers, many of whom might be qualified to offer some useful practical remarks on the subject, as from the number of theatrical companies wandering about the country, applications of the like nature must be made to numerous magisterial divisions, and the penalty upon the Theatricals for keeping open without such license might be a heavy one, namely, not exceeding twenty pounds a day. As to the rules to be framed by justices, they must be governed by locality, but chiefly by the view to the maintenance of order.

Yours obediently,
Swindon. Wm. FOOTE.

Summary.

Mr. DUNDAS has been appointed Solicitor-General. The objections to an Equity man at Nisi Prius, where the law officers of the Crown are principally employed, are so numerous, that we are not surprised at the selection being made from the Common Law bar. It is with grief we learn that Mr. Justice CRESSWELL continues in bad health, and unable to attend to his judicial duties. The incident of the week that has given rise to the most talk in the Profession, is that which has been narrated and discussed in a leading article, and which, therefore, it is unnecessary to treat of here.

That we might be enabled to give at length the very important case of Borradaile v. Hunter, as well as to bring up some arrears of judgments and new statutes, we have been obliged to issue another double number. This will make the complement promised for the volume, and as the vacation is approaching, we hope that no more will be needed. Notwithstanding the enlarged space this week, we have been obliged to omit many reports and articles, and much intelligence and correspondence, for want of room. It is a rule to give precedence to the reports, except when matters of great urgency demand a place. A knowledge of the new decisions is of the first importance to the practitioner, and, therefore, speculative law is here made to give room to these.

REVIEW OF CASES

IN THE EQUITY, BANKRUPTCY, ECCLESIASTICAL, AND ADMIRALTY COURTS,

For the Half-year ending July 1, 1846.

ADMIRALTY.

NOT many cases of importance have occurred in this branch of the law; and those that have occurred are chiefly in reference to the very ordinary and frequent case of collision. An important decision, however, on the Pilotage Act has been incidentally come to in a case of this kind. By that Act the owners of vessels sailing up and down the Thames are compelled to take on board a duly licensed pilot. The Topaz, a Gravesend steamer, was at single anchor in the middle of the river, and was run into by a Dutch vessel which was going down the river, and thereby sustained damage. The question of compensation or non-compensation to the Topaz would have turned upon the question of which vessel was to be blamed; but a point was raised in favour of the Dutch vessel, which was, that as she had taken in a pilot, as directed by the provisions of the Pilotage Act, the owners were not responsible for his conduct, acting in their service under such circumstances, though he was a pilot whom they themselves had selected and constantly employed; and it was so held. (The Batavier, 6 Law T. 258.)

BANKRUPTCY.

Vesting of estate.—A point of considerable importance has lately been decided on appeal as to the vesting of the estate of a bankrupt in the assignees by the operation of the Bankrupt Acts, and as to the abatement of a suit on the death of the official assignee, who had alone carried it on. The point was first raised before the Master of the Rolls, and was afterwards brought before the Lord Chancellor on appeal; and the decision of the Chancellor, confirming that at the Rolls, is that the estate of a bankrupt vests in the assignees jointly, under the operation of the Bankrupt Acts, notwithstanding they may come to the estate at different times and in different rights, as the official and creditors' assignees, and, consequently, the whole interest survives to the official assignee on the death of the sole creditors' assignee; and where a suit has been carried on by the official assignee alone, it does not abate by his death, but on the appointment of a new official assignee, he will be substituted as plaintiff under the 67th section of 6 Geo. 4, c. 16. (Mann v. Ricketts, 6 Law T. 293.)

Construction of statutes.—The stat. 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, gives the right to obtain interim and final protecting orders; and the Small Debts Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 127), by sec. 2, provides that "no protection, or interim, or other order issuing out of any Court of Bankruptcy or for the relief of insolvent debtors, nor any certificate obtained after such order for imprisonment under this Act, shall be available to any debtor imprisoned under such order as aforesaid." Now if, after an order under the Small Debts Act for payment of a debt by instalments, and default in payment, the debtor should obtain an interim order for protection, it would appear that the creditor could not obtain an order for imprisonment for non-payment of the instalments, unless the imprisonment in such case should be held to be, as perhaps it ought, not an arrest for debt, but a punishment for disobedience and contempt of the Court making the order for payment. And in re Tisdell, 6 Law T. 436, the Court seemed to think that to be the true construction; and in the same case, the creditor was allowed to oppose the debtor's obtaining the final order. On the construction of the Small Debts Act also it has been held, in re Reed, 6 Law T. 436, that a petition to the Court of Bankruptcy for protection from process, prosecuted since that Act was passed, and attested by an attorney not admitted in bankruptcy, is properly received; though under the previous stat. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, the attestation must have been by an attorney; but there must be an attestation by some one.

The Small Debts Act, sec. 3, enacts "that no imprisonment under the Act shall in anywise operate as a satisfaction or extinguishment of any debt or demand;" and it has been contended that debts within the provisions of this Act are removed from the operation of preceding statutes; and hence, in re Dover, 6 Law T. 415, it was held that a protection granted under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 70, was no answer to a summons issued under the Small Debts Act. And a debtor who vexatiously defends an action, whereby the costs are increased, and who at the time of giving instructions to his attorney to plead has no reasonable prospect of being able to pay the costs incurred by the creditor, is, after judgment obtained, and on being summoned under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127, liable to be committed under sec. 1 of that Act, for having wilfully contracted that part of the judgment debt which consisted of the costs, without reasonable prospect of being able to pay it, notwithstanding there was no evidence before the commissioner that the original debt had been improperly contracted. (Reynolds v Parker, 7 Law T. 7.)

Restriction on alienation.—The general rule is well settled that a person may give his property to another, so as to go over if he become bankrupt, &c. but he cannot give a continuing estate to such person to subsist after the bankruptcy, for that would be to alter the legal incidents of property. The cases of Twopenny v. Peyton, 10 Sim. 487, and Godden v. Crowhurst, 10 Sim. 642, in some measure broke in upon the rule, for in those cases an express provision that after bankruptcy, &c. the trustees should apply the fund for the maintenance and clothing of the bankrupt, and for no other purpose, was held to be valid. In the late case of Younghusband v. Gisborne, 7 Law T. 221, however, the rule was adhered to, the whole fund being made applicable to the maintenance and clothing of the annuitant in case of insolvency, &c. and the Lord Chancellor held, on appeal, that the assignee was entitled to it, notwithstanding the provision, thus questioning the latter, and apparently overruling the former, of the two cases in Simon.

Arrest of bankrupt.—A bankrupt having at the recommendation of the commissioner withdrawn his application for his certificate, his protection not then having expired, was arrested at the suit of a creditor, to prevent his going out of the jurisdiction. — Held, that such arrest was irregular. (Ex parte Benn, 6 Law T. 299.)

CONTRACT.

The unsettled state of the law as to railway transactions renders almost any case of importance which may tend to throw light upon the subject of the rights and liabilities of persons engaged therein. Accordingly we refer our readers to the case of Parsons v. Spooner, 6 Law T. 344, in which a contract entered into by the provisional committee was held to be unfavourable against the committee of directors formed out of the shareholders after the parliamentary contract and subscribers' agreement were signed. And on demurrer, general allegations shewing that the company had done all acts required to make them a legal body under a general Act of Parliament (The Joint Stock Company Registration Act) were sufficient to support a bill to enforce the contract against the committee of directors so formed. And in Walford v. Adie, 7 Law T. 27, it was held that a member of a joint stock company may sell his shares to the company without fraud upon the other shareholders, where the proceeding is done according to the rules of the company, and thus relieve himself from further liability, although he knew at the time the company were embarrassed, and obtained that information from the situation he held in the company.

COSTS.

Taxation.—The construction of the New Solicitors' Act (7 & 8 Vict. c. 73), in so far as regards the taxation of solicitors' bills of costs, is now pretty well settled. The greatest misconception prevailed at first, and to some extent yet prevails, as to the jurisdiction of the Court on petitions for taxation, and, accordingly, constant attempts were made to prevail upon the Court to take into consideration special agreements in reference to the costs or the mode of taxation. This the Court has over and over again refused to do, as not having jurisdiction. Again, where a third party becomes chargeable with a bill of costs incurred by a client to his solicitor, mistakes have been, and are still in some few instances, made, in supposing that the party chargeable stands in a different position from the client, and has different rights; whereas taxation, if allowed at all, is allowed on precisely the same terms as it would be to the client himself. Consequently, where there is no pressure at the time of payment by the client, nor any item impugned, taxation will be allowed on the petition of a third party. (Re Evans, 6 Law T. 254.) And specific errors must be alleged before a petition for leave to except to the Taxing Master's report will be allowed. Thus, an order being made, on the petition of a country solicitor, for the taxation of all his town agent's bills, the Taxing Master taxed all but those which, being in bankruptcy, had been previously taxed there, and paid; and, as to these, he called upon the town agent merely to prove his disbursements: it was held, that charges in a petition for leave to except to the report were without foundation, no specific error being alleged to have been made. (Re Smith, 7 Law T. 79.) The New Orders of May 1845 apply to taxation of costs since they came into operation, and, accordingly, in Ex parte Fisher, 7 Law T. 154, the practice as to costs came into discussion. The 5th article of the 120th of the New Orders, directs that, "where costs are to be taxed as between party and party, the Taxing Master may allow to the party entitled to receive such costs all such just and reasonable expenses as appear (among other things) to have been properly incurred in procuring the attendance of counsel in the Master's offices upon questions relating to pleadings or title." On this it was held that the Taxing Master was right, on a reference to him to tax costs as between party and party, in disallowing the costs of procuring the attendance of counsel before the Master, for the purpose of resisting a discharge in an executor's account. (Russell v. Nicholls, 7 Law T. 154.)

By what party to be paid.—On principle, the losing party in a case of litigation should pay the costs, as the other party is thereby proved to have the right; and, accordingly, the general rule is, that the costs follow the result; but there are exceptions. In Millington v. Fox, 3 Myl. & Cr. 338, Lord Cottenham says:—"I am very much disposed, as a general rule, to make the costs follow the result, because, however doubtful the title may be, or however proper it may be to dispute it, it is but fair that the party who really has the right should be re-imbursed, as far as giving him the costs of the suit can re-imburse him; but then there is another object which the Court must keep in view, namely, to repress unnecessary litigation, and to keep litigation within those bounds which are essential to enable the parties to vindicate and establish their rights." The rule, as well as the exception to it, are well exemplified in the late case of Pearce v. Franks, 6 Law T. 314, where the costs of an injunction suit, in which the plaintiff was substantially successful, having been increased by an allegation in the bill which was untrue, the Court ordered such increased costs to be paid by the plaintiff. Where an error has occurred in a decree, and the town-agent being told of it applies to the plaintiff's solicitor to have it corrected, who promises to have it done, but does not do so, and the town-agent does not inquire further, the costs of a petition to correct the error were held to be payable by the town-agent. (Re Bolton, 6 Law T. 451.)

Trustees.—The amount of costs is often very much increased by the conduct of the parties, rather than by the difficulties or importance of the case, and frequently the practice of the Court is taken advantage of, simply to increase costs. A striking illustration of this is to be found in Merryweather v. Barber, 6 Law T. 430, where trustees appeared by different solicitors, and thereby greatly increased the costs. But Vice-Chancellor Wigram, in that case, warned all parties in future that he would not allow costs in similar cases; and observed, that when it was the practice not to allow separate creditors costs before the Master, there never was any difficulty to make arrangements to act by one solicitor.

Assignee—Disclaimer.—The practice has been rather unsettled as to the allowance of costs to the provisional and other assignees who have disclaimed. In Mitf. Pl. 319, it is said—"If the defendant disclaims he will be entitled to his costs; but where the plaintiff has a right to know whether the defendant has an interest at the time the bill was filed, and he is properly brought before the Court, and the defendant says, I now abandon my interest, then it is simply a question of discretion with the Court whether it shall order the plaintiff to pay the defendant's costs or not, on the ground that he ought not to have filed the bill without first seeing the suit was necessary; for if he might have got from the defendant, without suit, that which he asks, it is common to say he shall pay costs." So that it is not merely disclaiming all interest that entitles to costs, but it must be shewn that the disclaiming assignee at the time of the filing of the bill had no interest; for if that be shewn, then he is improperly made a defendant and brought before the Court unnecessarily, and is therefore entitled to his costs. An impression prevailed among many practitioners that a disclaimer of all interest now (that is when disclaimed) or at any time previously entitled the assignee to costs, but that a simple disclaimer of any interest at the time of the disclaimer merely without more did not. A late case, however, appears to have taken the true distinction in such cases. In Gabriel v. Sturgis, 6 Law T. 452, Vice-Chancellor Wigram says:—"The defendants have disclaimed, and the terms of their disclaimer are different; Sturgis says he does not and never did claim any interest; the other defendant disclaims, and says that he does not now claim any interest; I consider this distinction in form makes no real difference in the question; for the question to be asked is, in my view, about these costs, and not mere words; the only distinction, in my opinion, to be taken is this: whether at the time the bill was filed the defendant disclaimed all interest, and was therefore improperly made a party; or whether, not denying that he had an interest at the time the bill was filed, he now chooses to abandon all such interest." And again: "The distinction I have always taken is this, that where a party disclaims so as to shew that he had no interest when the bill was filed, that is the principle of disclaimer which, according to the settled rules of the Court, may be stated as entitling a party to costs." The same judge, in the case of Griggs v. Sturgis, 6 Law T. 478, held that a provisional assignee was not upon disclaimer as a matter of course entitled to his costs in a foreclosure suit. So in Gibson v. Nichol, 7 Law T. 108.

Constructive payment—Special directions.—It may happen that in ascertaining what payments have been made on account of bills, questions of law and of fact may arise which may require to be determined even in the limited jurisdiction under which bills are taxed, but whatever the Court itself might feel to be its duty in such cases, the Master's duty is to confine himself, in a case where he has received no special directions from the Court, to simple payments plainly proved to have been made on account of the bills, and not to take upon himself to certify whether a certain alleged transaction, not amounting to actual payment, is or is not a transaction which a court of law or equity would, under the circumstances, adjudge to constitute a debt or payment. (Re Smith, 7 Law T. 79.)

COSTS.

Security for.—The ordinary rule of Court that a solicitor cannot be allowed to contract with his client, or to take security for his costs, applies to a case in which a trustee stipulates with a solicitor that a demand should not be made upon him personally for charges in reference to the trust; but, in the case of a railway scheme, where some expenses were incurred by the solicitor, in promoting the scheme before the appointment of the provisional committee, the rule does not apply, the solicitor being entitled to be paid those at least, and a contract by the solicitor with the chairman of the committee to look to the deposit or joint stock of the company only for repayment is valid. (Parsons v. Spooner, 6 Law T. 344.)

Railway Company.—In the case of Re Bristol and Exeter Railway Company, 7 Law T. 2, the Act of that Company, directing money to be invested in land, there had been two references to the Master, relating to the purchase of two separate pieces of land, and an account had been taken of the amount due on certain mortgages thereof, the costs of the proceedings were held to be payable by the company.

COVENANT.

The stat. of Wm. & M. c. 14, gives the remedy of an action of debt against the devisees of real estate, and unless an action of debt would lie, the statute was inapplicable; consequently, when the covenant was contingent, and unascertained, damages were only to be recovered for the breach of it; such a case did not come within the statute, and there was no remedy. But a judgment recovered in an action for damages for a breach of a covenant, after the death of a covenantor, is a debt which may be levied, with interest, upon the real estate of the covenantor, in the hands of his devisees, where his personal estate is found insufficient. (Moore v. Tucker, 6 Law T. 389.)

CREDITORS.

The statutes 13 Eliz. c. 5, and 27 Eliz. c. 4, made in favour of creditors, have been very prolific in litigation, and the cases upon them are both numerous and complicated. The deeds which are rendered void by them, as against creditors or others, are of two sorts; first, deeds made with an express intent to defraud creditors or subsequent purchasers; and, second, deeds upon good, but not valuable, considerations, which are usually called voluntary conveyances. The case of Buckle v. Mitchell, 18 Ves. 100, is a direct authority for holding that an equitable interest on land, entitling a party by contract to clothe it with a legal estate, makes such a party a purchaser in the opinion of the Court, and entitles him to avoid a voluntary settlement, and enforce his security. In Lister v. Turner, 7 Law T. 3, a post-nuptial settlement by a trader was held to be void against an equitable mortgagee, though the settlor, at the time of executing the settlement, had property three times the amount of his debts.

ECCLIASTICAL COURT.

Probate.—In the Marquis of Hertford v. Zichi, it was held that where a person used the term "codicil" in reference to another paper, it meant a codicil valid per se, duly executed under the statute; but in that case there were two sets of papers which would answer the description, and of course they were rejected. Sometimes, in such cases of reference, the contents of the paper are referred to, so as to incorporate it with and make it a part of the instrument referring to it; and, in a late case, where a testator left a will, a paper signed by one witness only, but endorsed "a codicil to my will," and a codicil duly executed, referring to "another codicil," all the three papers were admitted to probate. (Ingoldby v. Ingoldby, 6 Law T. 499.)

Church-rate, validity of.—Few points of this kind have been reported within the last six months, nor are there any worth noticing since the celebrated Braintree case. It is deserving of attention, however, that where a party is dissatisfied with the decision of the chairman of the vestry meeting, as to the majority, it is his duty to demand a poll, and the objection that the chairman had wrongly decided cannot be taken if that duty be neglected. (Cornwall v. Wood, 7 Law T. 189.)

THE PRACTICE OF WILLS.

By G. S. ALLNUTT, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

Alienation of estate.—Under the old law, a devise might be either partially or wholly revoked by the partial or entire alienation of the estate which was the subject of the devise.

Where a conveyance of the estate was made for a limited purpose only (as in the case of a mortgage, &c.), the will was revoked pro tanto only. (Perkins v. Walk, 1 Vern. 97; Cave v. Holford, 3 Ves. 654; 7 Bro. P. C. 593; Earl Temple v. Duchess of Chandos, 3 Ves. 685; and Brain v. Brain, 6 Madd. 221.)

Parceners and tenants in common retain the same estate and interest after partition, and though the partition be made by deed and fine instead of by writ, the prior devise is not revoked. (Luther v. Kidby, 8 Vin. Ab. 148, pl. 30; 3 P. Wms. 170, n.; Risley v. Lady Ballinglass, Sir T. Raym. 240). But where, by the deed effecting the partition, a moiety was given to such uses as the testator should appoint, and in default of appointment to him in fee, a prior devise by him was held to be revoked, the deed not being strictly confined to effecting the partition. (Tickner v. Tickner, before Lord Chief Justice Lee, and cited and acceded to by Lord Hardwicke in Parsons v. Freeman, 3 Atk. 741.)

In Attorney-General v. Vigor, 8 Ves. 256, a devise was held to be revoked by an exchange, although the land, after the death of the deviser, was restored to his heir under an arrangement, in consequence of a defect discovered in the title of the other party to the exchange.

If a testator had the land at the date of his will, and was disseised afterwards, the act not being an act of volition, and afterwards he entered, he was remitted to his old title, and therefore the land passed by his will. (Attorney-General v. Vigor, 8 Ves. 282.)

Where there were ulterior limitations in a mortgage-deed, which were beyond the purposes of the mortgage, a prior devise of the estate was held to be wholly revoked. (Kenyon v. Sutton, cited in Williams v. Owen, 2 Ves. jun. 601; Herwood v. Oy- lander, 6 Ves. 199; S.C. 8 Ves. 106; and Hodges v. Green, 4 Russ. 28; see also Brain v. Brain, 6 Madd. 221.)

If the owner of an unqualified equitable estate devised it by his will, and afterwards took a conveyance of the unqualified legal estate, this was no revocation of the will, because the conveyance was incident to the equitable estate; as a partition was no revocation, because incident to a joint estate. (Fullarton v. Watts, Dougl. 691, n.; Parsons v. Freeman, Amb. 116; S.C. 1 Wils. 308; Clough v. Clough, 3 Myl. & Keen, 296; and Ward v. Moore, 4 Madd. 368.)

The case was different where, the contract not providing for it, a conveyance had been made to the usual limitations to bar dower. In Rawlins v. Burgis (2 Ves. & Bea. 385), Sir Thos. Plumer, V.C. said, "It has long been settled that a devise is not revoked by merely taking the legal estate, doing no more. That doctrine is stated in Roll. (1 Roll's Ab. 606, pl. 3); and although that case is opposed by Pulbury v. Trevilian (Dy. 142, b), no doubt can now be admitted on a point that has been long at rest. The question, then, is, whether any thing more was done, or whether the estate remained the same, without modification. The peculiarity of this case arises from applying the principles of a court of equity to an estate contracted for, but not actually conveyed. At law the contract creates a mere right, but no estate on which the will could operate: a case having no analogy to that of an estate actually vested in the deviser by conveyance. It is not now to be disputed, that if the deviser, being at the date of his will seised in fee, had subsequently made a feoffment to such uses as he should appoint, with remainder to himself in fee, that feoffment would have amounted to a revocation. The reasons are expressed by the Lord Chancellor, in Maunderell v. Maunderell (10 Ves. 264), where the distinction between Luther v. Kidby (8 Vin. Tit. Devise, r. 6, pl. 30, stated 3 P. Wms. 170; 2 Ves. jun. 600); and Tickner v. Tickner is clearly stated. The latter case has been so often recognized by Lord Hardwicke, Lord Alvanley, and Lord Eldon, that it is not now to be shaken. With regard to the equitable interest created by the contract, a purchaser before conveyance is in equity owner of the estate almost to every purpose: I qualify the proposition, as before payment of the purchase-money he may be restrained from cutting timber. If before conveyance a house should be burnt down, the loss would be his (Paine v. Meller, 6 Ves. 349; see 2 Vern. 280; 1 Eq. Ca. Ab. 25; 1 P. Wms. 60; 2 P. Wms. 632; 2 Atk. 273; 1 Bro. C. C. 156; 7 Ves. 274). If any acquisition by lives dropping should accrue, the profit would be his: as between the representatives of the purchaser his interest is considered as real estate; and a contract to sell a devised estate has the effect of revoking the devise. This contract under which the deviser became equitable owner of the estate, and was to have a good estate in fee-simple conveyed to him in the following September, is silent as to the form of the conveyance except by those general terms. The conveyance, therefore, which this Court would have directed, must have been of a pure, unqualified estate in fee, the contract pointing at nothing else. If the vendor had tendered this conveyance, the purchaser would not have been bound to accept it, but might have objected that the estate was modified in a manner different from his contract. If, then, a conveyance in fee would not have been a good execution of the contract, can this be so? Can an estate thus modified by the introduction of a power of appointment, to be executed only before two witnesses, and a trustee interposed, be represented as the same estate, a mere substitution of legal for the equitable fee, and therefore no revocation when the very slight alteration of the deviser's disposing power in Tickner v. Tickner had that effect? The argument that the beneficial interest remained the same would overturn that case. The conclusion must be, that there was some object beyond the mere completion of the contract by taking the legal estate, the case in that respect resembling Brydges v. The Duchess of Chandos (2 Ves. 417), and differing from Williams v. Owens (2 Ves. jun. 595). The consequence is, that the estate, when the purchaser died, was changed: it was no longer the same that he had by the contract; and; consistently with all the authorities, the effect is a revocation."

tracted for the sale of it, the devise was revoked, if at the time of the testator's death the contract were such that the testator might have enforced it against the purchaser, or the purchaser might have enforced it against the testator. (Bennett v. The Earl of Tankerville, 19 Ves. 170, and Tebbutt v. Voules, 6 Sim. 40.) "Even if the contract had been abandoned in the testator's life," observed Sir W. Grant, M. R. in Bennett v. The Earl of Tankerville, "I very much doubt whether that would have set up the will again without a republication."

By the 23rd section of the 1 Vict. c. 26, it is enacted "that no conveyance or other act made or done subsequently to the execution of a will of or relating to any real or personal estate therein comprised, except an act by which such will shall be revoked as aforesaid, shall prevent the operation of the will with respect to such estate or interest in such real or personal estate as the testator shall have power to dispose of by will at the time of his death."

A question has been raised upon this section as to the right to the purchase-money of an estate devised by the will, and afterwards contracted to be sold by the testator. Mr. H. Sugden, in his comment upon the Wills Amendment Act, considers that it may be contended that by force of this section the purchase-money would, in such a case, belong to the devisee of the estate; but Mr. Jarman (Treatise on Wills, vol. I. p. 14) is of opinion that the case of Knollys v. Shepherd (cited in Wall v. Bright, 1 Jac. & Walk. 499) is an express decision in favour of the contrary view. In Knollys v. Shepherd, a testator having contracted for the sale of an estate, devised to his wife "all that his estate which he had contracted to sell to M.;" and it was held that this did not give the wife a right to the purchase-money; and certainly the decision appears to be conclusive upon the question.

Invalid conveyances.—Under the old law, where an attempt was made to alien the property, but, in consequence of the absence of some necessary formality, the attempt proved ineffectual, the devise of that property was nevertheless held to be revoked. "There are several instances," Lord Hardwicke observed, in Beard v. Beard (3 Atk. 72), "in this court where an incomplete act, and void at law, has been held here to be a revocation of a will notwithstanding, as a feoffment without livery, &c."

A covenant to surrender copyhold property previously devised was held to be a revocation of the will in equity, if the surrender would have been a revocation at law (Vauser v. Jeffery, 2 Swanst. 268); and in that case Lord Eldon said, "A bargain and sale, without enrolment, feoffment without livery of seisin, imperfect conveyances, though not capable to pass the estate, would amount to a revocation. Copyhold estates, not being within the statute which requires the attestation of three witnesses to a will, it may be a question whether many acts are not revocations of a will of copyholds which would not work a revocation in the case of freeholds."

In Simpson v. Walker (5 Sim. 1) it was held by Sir L. Shadwell, V.C. that a deed executed under circumstances which rendered it void in equity, and not at law, was a revocation of a prior will.

In Matthews v. Venables (9 Moore, 286, and 2 Bing. 136) it was held that a deed did not operate as a revocation of a will under the following circumstances:—A, by will, duly attested, devised all her freehold property to trustees for the use of B; seven days after executing the will she conveyed a part of the property to trustees for a charitable purpose, pursuant to 9 Geo. 2, c. 36; nine days after she made a codicil, attested by three witnesses, by which codicil she appointed another trustee, and directed that her money out at mortgage should be first applied to the payment of her debts. She died within a twelvemonth after the execution of the deed, which consequently became void, and the deed was held not to be a revocation of the will.

Implied revocation.—A codicil referring to a former will as the last will was, under the old law, held to cancel intermediate wills. (Lord Walpole v. Lord Orford, 3 Ves. 402.)

All codicils are part of the will; and therefore a codicil merely for a particular purpose, as to change an executor, and confirming the will in all other respects, does not revive a part of the will revoked by a former codicil. (Crosbie v. Macdonald, 4 Ves. 610.)

Revival of revoked will.—By the 22nd sec. of the 1 Vict. c. 26, it is enacted, "that no will be"

codicil, or any part thereof which shall be in any manner revoked, shall be revived otherwise than by the re-execution thereof, or by a codicil executed in manner hereinbefore required, and shewing an intention to revive the same; and when any will or codicil which shall be partly revoked, and afterwards wholly revoked, shall be revived, such revival shall not extend to so much thereof as shall have been revoked before the revocation of the whole thereof, unless an intention to the contrary shall be shown."

CHAP. V.—ON THE REPUBLICATION OF WILLS.

Under the old law, it was necessary that wills should be republished in order to include within their operation real estates acquired by the testator after his will had been made.

Many cases arose upon the constructive republication of wills; and in Pigott v. Waller (7 Ves. 98) it was held that a codicil, attested by three witnesses, though relating only to personal estate, and expressing no intention as to re-publication of the will, was a re-publication.

The contents of the codicil itself, however, might negative the presumed intention of a testator to republish his will. (Bowes v. Bowes, 7 Durn. & E. 482; Hughes v. Turner, 3 Myl. & K. 666; and other cases.)

It will be remembered, that wills executed since 1837 speak from the death of the testator, and therefore the decisions under the old law upon the subject of re-publication are not of much importance with regard to wills made since the passing of the Wills Amendment Act.

By the 34th section of that Act it is enacted, "that every will re-executed, or re-published, or revived by any codicil shall, for the purposes of that Act, be deemed to have been made at the time at which the same shall be so re-executed, re-published, or revived." A will, therefore, executed before 1838 will be brought within the operation of the 1 Vict. c. 26, by the execution of a codicil reviving the same after the 1st of January, 1838.

PROMOTIONS, APPOINTMENTS, ETC.

Clarks of the Peace for Counties, Cities, and Boroughs will oblige by regularly forwarding the names and addresses of all new Magistrates who may qualify.]

We have very much pleasure in announcing the appointment of Mr. Dundas to the office of Solicitor-General. The choice is an excellent one. Mr. Dundas is not only a lawyer, but a scholar and a gentleman, and his indifferent health has alone prevented him from before attaining the high position to which his talents have long given him a claim.

LEGAL INTELLIGENCE.

THE CIRCUITS.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.

YORK, FRIDAY, JULY 10.—The assizes for the county of York commenced here to-day. Their Lordships, after attending divine service, sat for the despatch of business at twelve o'clock, Mr. Justice Creswell presiding on the criminal side, and Mr. Justice Wightman on the civil. The calendar for the county contains 70 cases, implicating 101 persons. There are 3 persons for trial in the city. There are 4 cases of murder, 1 of attempt to murder, 10 of manslaughter, 8 of rape, 3 of forgery, 6 of cutting and wounding, 2 of maliciously shooting, 1 of arson, and 10 of burglary. On the civil side there are 103 causes entered for trial; 90 in the West Riding list, and but 13 in the list for the North and East Ridings.

WESTERN CIRCUIT.

WINCHESTER, JULY 13.—The commission was opened in this city on Saturday last. The judges appointed for this circuit, Mr. Justice Erle and Mr. Baron Platt, were met and escorted into the city with the usual formalities by the High Sheriff, John Beadmore, esq. and immediately proceeded to the Assize-hall, where the commission was read. The cause list contains an entry of eleven causes, of which four are marked for special juries. The calendar is light, there being only 34 prisoners for trial, and the charges against them are mostly of trifling character. Of these there is 1 of manslaughter, 1 of arson; shooting with intent to murder, 1; concealment of birth, 1; forgery, 1; burglary, 5; assault with intent, 1; night poaching, 2; robbery, 7; larceny, 14.

NORFOLK CIRCUIT.

BUCKINGHAM, SATURDAY, JULY 11.—Mr. Justice Williams opened the commission for this county yesterday, and at 10 o'clock this morning his Lordship and Mr. Baron Alderson opened their respective courts; there being two causes only on the civil side (one of which was undefended), while the calendar, in consequence of the recent sessions, was equally light, there being nine prisoners in all.

OXFORD CIRCUIT.

OXFORD, JULY 12.—The commission was yesterday opened with the usual formalities by Mr. Justice Maule. In the calendar there appear the names of 19 prisoners:—murder, 2; rape, 1; arson, 2; killing sheep, 1; sheep stealing, 1; poaching, 3; burglary, 1; housebreaking, 1; horse stealing, 1; assault, 1; larceny, 5.

There are nine cases entered, of which three are special jury cases. Among them is the case of Doe dem. The Mayor and Corporation of Oxford v. The Rector and Fellows of Exeter College, in which the title of the latter to their chapel will be disputed, in which Sir Fitzroy Kelly is specially retained.

MIDLAND CIRCUIT.

NORTHAMPTON, MONDAY, JULY 13.—The justices of assize for this circuit, the Hon. Sir John Patteson and the Hon. Sir John Taylor Coleridge, took their seats in the County-hall, Mr. Justice Patteson presiding in the Crown Court, and Mr. Justice Coleridge (who, though apparently still far from well, and shewing manifest indications of having been recently labouring under severe and protracted illness, yet seemed, we are most happy to be able to say, convalescent) taking his appointed seat on the Civil Side. The calendar is remarkably light for this county, presenting only 12 cases, and the names of 11 prisoners for trial, of whom one stood indicted upon two charges of setting fire to barns, stables, stacks, &c.; one for stabbing, cutting, and wounding; one for robbery; one for assault with intent to rob; one for stealing from the person; one for breaking and entering a dwelling-house; and one for concealing the birth of a child. The other cases were of a most trifling character. There appeared to be one case only in the borough, which was for cutting and wounding. On the civil side the list presented eight causes for trial, of which four were marked for special juries, one of which, Bullin v. Masters and Another, is an issue from the Court of Chancery upon a question of title modus.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—On Monday morning the mortal remains of the late Chief Justice Tindal were removed from Bedford-square, for interment in the family vault at Kensal-green Cemetery. At nine o'clock the mournful cortege, consisting of a hearse drawn by six horses and ten mourning coaches, each drawn by four horses, moved from the house, and taking the shortest route arrived at the cemetery shortly after ten. About fifty gentlemen, principally the immediate relatives and friends of the deceased, comprised the attendants, amongst whom we noticed Mr. Baron Parke, Sir W. Symonds (of the Civil Department Royal Navy), Major Symonds, Capt. Symonds, R.N. Capt. Tindal, R.N. and Mr. C. G. Tindal, (sons of the deceased), Mr. Bosanquet the banker (son-in-law to the deceased), the Rev. J. E. Tyler, Sir J. de Vieuille (of St. Helen's, Jersey), Major Woodroffe, W. Woodroffe, Esq. A. N. Skirrow, Esq. &c. &c. The outer coffin, which was covered with purple velvet and richly furnished, bore the following inscription: "The right honourable Sir Nicholas Conyngham Tindal, lord chief justice of her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas, died July 8, 1846, aged 69 years." Having arrived at the cemetery, the coffin was taken out and conveyed to the chapel, where the funeral service was read in a very impressive manner by the Rev. Mr. Tyler. At the conclusion the coffin was moved to the family vault, where lay the remains of Lady Tindal, wife of the deceased, who died several years since, and the Rev. Mr. Tindal, one of his sons.

THE LATE CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—The lamented Lord Chief Justice was a native of Chelmsford, and that town will ever feel an honest pride in having sent to the judicial bench a man over whose sudden demise all parties mourn, whose high and excellent qualities, independence, and integrity all parties admit, and whose name and authority will long be quoted and felt in British jurisprudence. He was descended from Dr. Matthew Tindal, a celebrated controversial writer of a former day, and from the Rev. Nicolas Tindal, a man of literary reputation, who was rector of Great Waltham in 1722, and who wrote a portion of a history of Essex, which, however, he gave up to undertake a translation of Rapin's History of England. The father of Sir Nicolas, as before stated, was a solicitor of this town, and the first seeds of that ripe and ready scholarship which soon after won for him distinction at the University, were sown at the grammar school here, then under the mastership of the Rev. Thomas Naylor. There are still living in this town and neighbourhood several of his schoolfellows, who speak of him as having when a youth given indications of those quick parts and that solid talent which afterwards marked his career, and enabled him to adorn the high office he so long filled.—Chelmsford Chronicle.

The late Right Hon. J. Walter, Earl Verulam, has left personally amounting to 25,000l. He has bequeathed to the countess 3,000l. per annum, and to each of the younger children 10,000l. each.

BOW-STREET.—Mr. James Wyld, the map engraver and publisher of Charing-cross, appeared to shew cause why he had failed to transmit to the British Museum copies of certain maps relating to the Oregon territory, the Punjab, &c. and published by him during the present year.

The charge was instituted by Sir H. Ellis, principal librarian of the Museum, in the name of the trustees, who were represented by Mr. Baldwin, the barrister.

The learned counsel, after calling attention to the provisions of the recently amended Copyright Act, under which the summons was taken out, examined a clerk in the service of the solicitors to the Museum, who deposed to having purchased the four maps which were the subject of the complaint, and stated the price he gave for each, as well as the date of each purchase.

Other officers in the institution gave evidence to the effect that no such maps had been deposited according to the Act. They could not say that a book containing one of them had not been received. There were no entries relating to the maps distinctly.

The defence of Mr. Wyld was, that inasmuch as the maps had appeared in a work before being published in a separate form, and that work had been duly deposited, the requisites of the Act had been complied with. It often happened also that maps were republished with the slightest possible alteration in a line or curve; but surely the publisher was not required to send a copy of every distinct issue. Neither the British Museum, nor any other building, would contain them if such a regulation were enforced.

The defendant's solicitor, Mr. Serjeant, discussed the terms and tendency of certain clauses in the Act at considerable length, but

Mr. JARDINE was clearly of opinion that the maps in question, as separate publications, ought to have been deposited. The Act gave him the power of fining the defendant the value of each publication, besides inflicting a penalty not exceeding 5l.

His worship then fined Mr. Wyld the value of each map (namely, 3s., 13s., 4s. and 14s. respectively), and inflicted the further penalty of 20s. upon each.

The fines were of course paid; but the defendant signified his intention to appeal, if he had the power.

CONVEYANCING PRACTICE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Although "Delta" requests the opinion of one of your "able correspondents" on the point submitted by him, yet I hazard the risk of being deemed presumptuous in venturing to give one both on that, and the questions propounded by a "Solicitor," and "An Original Subscriber," assuming that the word "retain," in Delta's letter, is a misprint for "return."

I never heard it doubted that a mortgagee, on being tendered the amount of his principal and interest, after a regular notice, was bound to deliver up the deeds to the mortgagor, or his solicitor. It by no means follows that a mortgagor would require a reconveyance, and it is certainly optional with him whether or not he would incur that expense, or suffer the inconvenience of leaving the legal estate outstanding. Should he require one, the mortgagee would, I conceive, be bound to execute it at any time, on his solicitor being paid the usual charges for the perusal of the draft, and obtaining the execution of the engross-ment. He would, however, have no right to detain the deeds in the meantime, and I should consider it both "unjustifiable and unprofessional" to refuse to deliver them up.

With respect to the point whether, on a transfer of a mortgage, the solicitor of the mortgagor, or of the mortgagee, has a right to prepare an abstract of the mortgage-deed, I think it is clearly in favour of the latter, and for this, amongst other reasons, that it is he only who, by producing the mortgage, can satisfy the transferee of the correctness of the abstract. This point was mooted some time since in your valuable publication, and the general opinion of the profession is, I believe, in accordance with that which has received your sanction, a guarantee for its correctness more valuable than my own.

As to the question submitted by a "Solicitor," the Act of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 76, gave power to every person to convey freehold land by deed, but did not, like the Lease for a Year Abolition Act, require that any deed executed under its authority should be expressed to be made in pursuance of it. The absence of such a reference cannot therefore be a sound objection to its validity: neither is the absence of the word "convey." There is no magical effect given to that word by the Act in question. It is the power to convey by a single deed, without the formalities attendant on the assurances enumerated in the second section, which was given by that statute; and as a conveyance was to have the same effect as if made by lease and release, the word "release," I apprehend, was sufficient, it not being the professed object of the Act to abolish the forms of established assurances, such as a release, a feoffment, or a bargain and sale, if parties chose to adopt their technical phraseology, whilst they were at liberty to dispense with their inconvenient peculiarities.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.

SATURDAY, JULY 18, 1846.

SIR FREDERICK THESIGER AND THE WATERMEN'S COMPANY.

A VERY curious affair has been agitated in the legal world, and has interested the general public, growing out of the disputes between the Corporation of the City of London and the Watermen's Company.

The latter had indicted the former for a nuisance, in obstructing the river, and Sir FREDERICK THESIGER, then Attorney-General, was retained to lead the prosecution. A long and heavy trial of some days was expected; the Court assembled, the witnesses were present, all was ready for a protracted fight, when the judge and jury were suddenly relieved from the painful prospect, by a movement among the counsel, and a statement by Sir F. THESIGER, that he had taken upon himself the responsibility of settling the dispute upon certain terms, which it is not necessary here to specify.

The next day an extremely indignant letter appeared in the Times, accusing Sir FREDERICK THESIGER of having acted without authority from his clients, and sacrificing their interests to his own convenience. The Morning Chronicle thereupon took up the matter, and the following article made its appearance:—

Within the last few days, a transaction that requires some sort of explanation, occurred at the sittings of the Central Criminal Court, and we trust that, for the honour of the English Bar, such an explanation it will at once receive. Sir Frederick Thesiger is the party whose conduct is arraigned. Considering his high character, and the general regard in which he is held by his brethren, we wish to confine ourselves as much as possible to a simple statement of facts.

Every one who has passed up or down the "ancient navigable river Thames," must have remarked that huge mass of timbers, close to Blackfriars-bridge, which obstructs the course of the navigation, under the pretence of purposes of utility as a landing-place. We need not enter into the story of the squabbles and dissensions between the Corporation of London and the Watermen's steamers. It has already been before the public usque ad nauseam, and every one will remember the transactions to which we refer. The last measure decided upon by the aggrieved watermen appears to have been to prefer an indictment against the Corporation and Citizens of London for obstructing the navigation of the river, and disturbing the public in their right of enjoyment of another landing-place, which was destroyed by the erection of the new pier. The grand jury, upon inquiry, found a bill for the prosecution, containing five counts, into the technical particularities of which it would be unnecessary to enter. In substance they simply alleged the grievances enunciated above. The case was placed by the prosecutors in the hands of Sir Frederick Thesiger, as leader, with whom, we believe, were Mr. Chambers and Mr. H. Hill. On the opposite side, for the Mayor and Corporation, there was a formidable array, consisting of the most eminent counsel at the bar. All matters had been settled and agreed upon, and the case was to come on early this week for trial. So lately as the 30th of last month there had been a consultation, in which various precautions connected with proof and evidence were taken, and not a word was then breathed by Sir Frederick Thesiger, of withdrawing the record, and confident anticipations were uttered, by no one more so than by himself, of a successful issue to the trial. Our readers may judge, then, of the surprise felt by every body, when Sir Frederick Thesiger, on the day of trial, without any previous consultation or notice, contrary to the entreaties of his clients, and, we believe, to the opinions of his juniors (both eminent men), expressed his determination to withdraw the record upon his own responsibility. His reason for doing so was this—he said that he had no doubt they should be able to obtain a verdict upon this trial, and compel the mayor and corporation to abate the nuisance; but the effect of this would be, that the mayor and corporation would turn upon the successful parties, namely, the watermen, and compel them, in turn, to take down their piers for the whole length of the river, the consequence of which would be that the shareholders in these Watermen's companies would be deprived of their only means of subsistence. Now, with all due deference to Sir Frederick Thesiger, as a mere question of law, it is, we apprehend, more than doubtful if the mayor and corporation could succeed at all in such a step; but in the next place, and this is a question of far more importance, this is not a point which he, in his professional capacity, was called upon to decide. It is quite true that it is the duty of counsel to call the attention of clients to the effects of any step which he may have to take on their behalf; it is also quite clear that he is fully justified in refusing to plead a cause, if he should disapprove of the line of prosecution, or of the propriety of continuing a prosecution at all. But here there is this important point to be considered, that such rejection of advocacy must take place in time; a barrister must not, either by actual consent, or by construction, induce a client, or a body of clients, to rely upon him until the twelfth hour, and then abandon them at the moment of their utmost need. This would be a fatal precedent to establish, utterly derogatory to, and subversive of, the high character and standing of the English Bar. What certainty could a client have that his interests would be safe in the hands of a body of men who constituted themselves arbitrary and irresponsible judges of the fortunes of their fellow-subjects?

As to imputing any thing like improper motives to Sir Frederick Thesiger, we beg to say for ourselves, most distinctly, that we have no such intention. It would take more than one act of indiscretion, or wrong judgment, to upset the respect due to a career so long and honourable as his has been. Nothing would give us greater pleasure than having the means of rebutting for him the charge to which, at the present moment, he is considered to be amenable. Had it not been that a principle was at stake, as to the relations between counsel and client, we should have been glad to have passed the matter over without any kind of notice, but, as it is, we should not have felt justified in refraining from calling attention to it.

This called forth from a writer, who appears anonymously, but whose name was doubtless given to the editor, the letter which we next extract. Great prominence was given to it by placing it among the leading articles, and it was consequently presumed that it came from authority:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING CHRONICLE.

SIR,—I have read with considerable astonishment, in the Morning Chronicle of this day, an article reflecting upon the conduct of Sir Frederick Thesiger, in reference to the late indictment against the City of London for a nuisance at Blackfriars-bridge; and as I am convinced that you were influenced by what you considered to be a sense of public duty in giving insertion to the article, I entertain no doubt that, on the other hand, as a matter of personal justice to Sir Frederick Thesiger, you will allow me, who was present upon the occasion of the trial, and who have not the slightest connection with the cause or any of the parties, to state the facts of the case as they actually occurred. The "transaction" to which you refer did not, as you state, occur at the Old Bailey, but in the Court of Queen's Bench, under the presidency of Lord Denman, and there was no "withdrawing of the record," an expression altogether inapplicable to the nature of the case. The jury having been sworn to try the indictment, Mr. Hugh Hill, the junior counsel for the prosecution (Sir Frederick Thesiger's junior), proceeded to the opening of the pleadings, upon which a consultation commenced between Sir Frederick Thesiger and his clients, the result of which was that Mr. Hill was requested not to proceed for a few minutes. The consultation between Sir Frederick and his clients was again resumed, and the final result was that he stated to Lord Denman and the jury that it was not proposed to offer any evidence in support of the indictment, and that the jury, therefore, would pronounce a verdict of acquittal. Occurrences of this nature are so familiar to every body acquainted with the proceedings of courts of criminal justice in this country, that no particular notice was taken by any body of the "transaction" at the time. The only "clients" whose wishes any advocate can recognize upon such an occasion, are the professional clients, that is to say, the solicitors, who are responsible for the proper conduct of the cause, and of whom there seemed to be several present upon the occasion; and it is so far from being true that the proceeding complained of was taken without consulting them, that such consultation actually took place in the presence of the whole Court, before the prosecution was given up. Indeed, the notion of any barrister giving up any cause in opposition to the will of his client seems, generally speaking, to be perfectly ridiculous, as we all know that barristers are every day compelled by their clients to go on with cases even after they become perfectly hopeless, and nothing can be more certain than that if the prosecutors upon the trial at Guildhall had uttered the smallest expression of discontent at the course recommended by their leader, Lord Denman would have allowed the parties to proceed without him.

Of the merits of the prosecution itself, or of the propriety of abandoning it, I say nothing at all; nor do I pretend to know what passed between Sir Frederick Thesiger and his clients, in the consultation which took place before he addressed the Court. With regard, however, to the highly respectable gentleman who acted as the junior in the case, I mean Mr. Hill, I can affirm, upon the authority of my own senses, that he not only did not express any dissent from the proceedings of his leader, but seemed to acquiesce altogether in the course which had been adopted.

I have the honour to remain, Sir, your obedient servant,
A BARRISTER.

Saturday, July 11, 1846.

It was presumed that with such an explanation the affair would have dropped. Not so, however. The volunteer defender had exceeded his instructions; he had said what was not quite true, and the next day there comes out the following letter from the attorneys in the case:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING CHRONICLE.

THE QUEEN v. THE CORPORATION OF LONDON.

SIR,—The gratuitous letter of "A Barrister," in your paper of this day, compels us to state that Sir Frederick Thesiger had no authority whatever from us to consent to a verdict of acquittal, but written instructions strenuously to prosecute the cause were contained in his brief.

It was determined at the consultation, with Sir Frederick Thesiger's full approbation, that these instructions should be fully acted up to. At the same time it was agreed, by all the counsel then present, that the prosecutors would be entitled to a verdict, that in point of law the corporation of London had no defence, and that the cause in effect was undefended.

Sir Frederick Thesiger, in court, interrupted Mr. Hugh Hill on opening the case, and after conferring with the counsel for the Corporation, addressed some observations to an attorney in our office, who had the management of the proceedings, and also to one of the directors of the Watermen's Steam Packet Company, intimating to them the course he intended to pursue, but both distinctly refused to sanction it.

"A Barrister" alludes to other counsel for the prosecution. We can state that the course adopted by their leader took them equally by surprise.

We are, Sir, your obedient servants,

NEWBON and EVANS,

Solicitors to the prosecution.

1, Wardrobe-place, Doctors' Commons,
July 13, 1846.

In this position of affairs the matter has assumed a complexion of great interest to the Profession, as involving questions of large importance relating to the duties and authorities of counsel, and upon this question we venture a few observations.

Let us begin with entirely disclaiming the remotest imputation of unworthy motives on the part of Sir FREDERICK THESIGER. Happily he is a man of such high and unimpeachable integrity that no person who knows any thing of our bar would give the slightest credence to the dirty insinuations which have been so freely cast upon him. Whatever he has done, has been done with the best and purest intentions, with no other object than the benefit of his clients. The question really raised is, how far counsel is justified in taking upon himself to settle a matter in dispute in which he is engaged for one of the parties, without or against the consent of his client. It is a question of practical importance, and of more difficulty than at first sight appears.

It is quite clear what is Sir FREDERICK THESIGER's opinion. He looks upon counsel as the client's substitute for the occasion, his duty being to do whatever his own judgment may dictate as the proper course to be pursued in the matter intrusted to his charge, even if the proceeding should be without or against the consent of the client. Sir FREDERICK THESIGER has practically shewn such to be his views of the duties and office of counsel, and on such a matter he is certainly a very high authority. No man now at the bar has a finer sense of professional honour than he, not only from long experience, but because he is a gentleman by nature, and therefore gifted with that instinct of honour which decides more promptly, and usually more correctly, than reason. In the case now under consideration we are, however, compelled to differ from his judgment, but with great deference. The grounds of that opinion we submit.

The difference lies at the very foundation of the argument—the scope of the duties of counsel, and consequently the extent of his authority. Sir F. THESIGER assumes that the retainer of counsel is general, quoad the particular case—that the conduct of the case is intrusted to him on his sole responsibility, his duty being to do that which he deems most for the interest of his client. Now, it seems to us that the fallacy lies in overlooking the purpose of the retainer. It is not general—it is not to do whatever he may deem best in the whole management of the case. His engagement is more limited. It is to carry the case through its trial. There his duty begins and ends. He will of course advise his client on the whole matter, and if he thinks a compromise desirable he will recommend its adoption; but he can properly do no more than advise. He should not act save in that for which he was retained—the conducting of the trial. There he is absolute; there it is his right and his duty to use his own discretion without consultation or consent; for with him rests the whole responsibility.

But it may be said that the power to conduct the trial includes a power to compromise the dispute. Here it is that we differ entirely from the view adopted by Sir F. THESIGER. The client has employed and paid the counsel to carry his cause through the Court. That he is bound to do, if the client desire it, whatever may be his own opinion as to the issue or the prudence of the proceeding. He may and he ought to advise his client as to the course which, in his opinion, would be the best; but it is entirely at the option of the client if he will adopt it. For counsel to settle a case untried without consulting his client or against his will, is, in our humble opinion, trespassing upon the province of the attorney. He has, in relation to the conduct of the case up to the time of trial and afterwards, the same absolute power which in the trial appertains to counsel. He may do, nay, he ought to do, any thing that he considers good for his client, while it is in his hands, even though it be contrary to the client's wishes.

For these reasons it appears to us that the course pursued by Sir F. THESIGER in the case that has given rise to the present controversy was wrong; but we have arrived at that conclusion with great hesitation and reluctance, seeing how high an authority is on the other side.

It is at least one of much practical importance to both branches of the Profession, and we should be glad to receive any objections that may be urged against the argument advanced above; in this, as in other matters, to ascertain the very truth is the object of the LAW TIMES.

VERULAM PUBLICATIONS.

THE fourth part of Cox's Criminal Cases is now ready. The numbers necessary to complete the first volume are in the press.

Cox and Atkinson's Registration Cases are in the press. No. IV. will be published on Tuesday, and No. V. on the Saturday following, when they may be had, sewn in a part with the numbers already published, and which will thus contain all the appeals decided from the commencement to the present time for 7s. 6d. only, the cost of the other reports of them being upwards of 30s. It should be observed, also, that this is the only report yet published that contains all the appeals hitherto decided.

Arrangements are in progress for the publication of a continuation of "Chitty's Practical Statutes."

Mr. SAUNDERS'S Practice of Summary Convictions is only the first of a series of works on the Practice of the Law. The subject was selected as one of very general interest and utility, as most country attorneys are engaged more or less in magistrates' law, or at least are consulted upon the matters of which this volume treats.

It will be followed by Mr. HUGHES'S Practice of Sales of Real Property, Mr. ALLNUTT'S Practice of Wills, and others of a like nature, required for the daily uses of the office.

NOTICES OF NEW LAW BOOKS.

Precedents in Pleading: with copious Notes on Pleading, Practice, and Evidence. By the late JOSEPH CHITTY, Jun. The Second Edition, containing References to all the Cases decided upon the new Rules of Pleading, and short preliminary Observations on the more important subjects. By HENRY PEARSON, Esq. of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. In two parts. Part I. London, 1846. Benning and Co.

This work needs no critic. The Profession have chosen to adopt it as their authority and guide, and some years of practical experience of its trustworthiness have justified the preference. A new value has now been given to it by the labour and learning of Mr. PEARSON, who has corrected faults, supplied omissions, and introduced improvements. A more complete collection of precedents in pleading it would be difficult to frame. Almost every imaginable state of facts will find here, if not a form expressly provided, at least a case so nearly in point that a pleader of ordinary skill may readily adapt it to the variances in the circumstances. Mr. PEARSON has added further to the utility of his edition by a series of preliminary observations pre-facing each class of pleas, and also by copious notes, in which all the cases down to the present time bearing upon the matter in hand are collected, and their points put in terse, unmistakable language, with occasional reference to other works upon the subject, where the practitioner may obtain further information. From its nature, the publication does not admit of illustrative extract, and we cannot say more of it than that to the pleader it will be indispensable, and to the general practitioner useful.

A Dictionary of English Law, Ancient and Modern. By W. M. BEST, A.M., L.L.B. of Gray's Inn, Esq. Barrister-at-Law. Part I. Richards, 1846.

The part before us, although a very small portion of the entire work, extending only to the word "Assumpsit," promises well for the completeness, and therefore for the utility of this new Law Dictionary. It is got up with great diligence and research. It contains many words not found in other dictionaries. But a type so large and so leaded will surely expand the work beyond all convenient proportions, and place its entire cost without the bounds of prudent outlay. Here we have 95 pages reaching only to the word "Assumpsit," and the charge for this is 3s. 6d. Now, this is less than a thirtieth part of the entire work, which will thus contain upwards of 3,000 pages, of which the cost will be about five guineas. We do not mean to say that this would be in itself an extravagant price for a good Law Dictionary; but the objection to the present arrangement is, that by adopting a small type and double columns the same matter might well be got into a single volume, at 30s. And the objection to text-books in small type does not apply to a book of reference. Nobody would set himself to read a dictionary right through. It is only taken up for a moment to find some information that will be read as conveniently in small type as in large, especially when the cost is thus reduced by four-fifths. We would recommend Mr. BEST to incur the expense of reprinting this part rather than to proceed with an enterprise which, in its present shape, can scarcely hope for success. His labours are too valuable to be thrown away. Whatever he does, he does well; and it would be a pity if this ably executed work should fail of the support its intrinsic worth deserves from injudicious arrangements in the manner of submitting it to the profession.

[ADVERTISEMENT.]

METROPOLITAN SEWAGE MANURE COMPANY.

THE House of Commons having referred the plan of this company to a Select Committee, to examine into its feasibility and probable success, the Committee has made the following report to the House:—
Veneris, 22^o die Maii, 1846.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to consider such plans as shall be laid before them for the application of the sewage of the metropolis to agricultural purposes, and to report their opinion to the House.

Ordered, That the Metropolitan Sewage Manure Company Bill, the reports of the Commissioners, and all petitions on the subject of the said Bill, be referred to the Committee.

Jovis, 28^o die Maii, 1846.

Committee nominated:—

Mr. Bingham Baring	Mr. William Hamilton
Mr. Hawes	Mr. Kemble
Colonel Fox	Mr. Brampton
Colonel Thomas Wood	Mr. Benjamin Smith
Lord Robert Grosvenor	Sir William Clay
Mr. Tower	Mr. Duncan
Sir De Lacy Evans	Mr. Redhead Yorke.
Mr. Bernal.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That five be the quorum of the said Committee.

And this the Report:—

The Select Committee appointed to consider such plans as shall be laid before them for the application of the Sewage of the Metropolis to agricultural purposes, and to report their opinion to the House; to whom the Metropolitan Sewage Manure Company Bill and the Reports of the Commissioners, and all petitions on the subject of the said Bill, were referred; and who were empowered to report the minutes of evidence taken before them to the House: have considered the matters to them referred, and agreed to the following report:—

Your committee have directed their attention to the several documents referred to them by your honourable House; they have considered the scheme proposed by the Metropolitan Sewage Manure Company for carrying away the refuse of the Ranelagh and King's Scholars' Pond Sewers, and rendering it available for agricultural purposes; they have examined the objections made to that scheme upon public grounds in the several petitions referred to them; they have entered so far into the merits of the competing projects as to enable them to decide, whether on their account, and for their sake, the bill of the established company now standing for a second reading should be rejected or postponed; and after examining witnesses on the subjects connected with their inquiry, they have agreed to the following report:—

With regard to Mr. Wicksted, who proposes to carry off the entire sewage of London in a tunnel of from 8 to 12 feet in diameter, and at a depth of from 40 to 80 feet under the level of the streets of London, they believe that the first experiment of dealing with sewage water had better be tried upon a smaller scale, upon one or two sewers only, and at a less formidable expense. It appears, moreover, from the evidence of Mr. Wicksted himself, that the temporary concession of the two outlying sewers in question to other parties would rather facilitate than impede the ultimate development of his scheme.

Your committee therefore are not disposed to recommend the postponement or rejection of the present Bill for the sake of Mr. Wicksted's plan. Neither would they be influenced to adopt this course by the consideration of Mr. Higgs' project.

Mr. Higgs proposes to construct, at the mouth of a sewer, or in some convenient spot to which the water of the sewer might be made to flow, three tanks; each of which tanks is to be of sufficient dimensions to contain the maximum amount of sewage brought down in the space of twelve hours. The precautions which he proposes to deal with the sewage so accumulated would probably preclude the possibility of any deleterious or offensive consequences, but the public mind is not at present prepared to risk the establishment of any such reservoirs, and no company has as yet been formed to carry his scheme into execution.

Having thus discarded the objections which might possibly be urged against the Bill, on the ground of its interference with a preferable competing measure, your committee turn to those which have been either urged in the petitions referred to them, or elicited in the examination of witnesses.

The main ground of complaint advanced by the owners or occupiers of neighbouring lands and houses is, that power has been taken in the Bill to construct reservoirs or tanks for the reception of stagnant and offensive sewage water. This power has now been unreservedly relinquished by the promoters. No reservoir, tank, or catch-pond can be constructed by the company under the proposed Act. The sewage will be conveyed in a covered shaft from the main sewer into the well, from which an engine will pump it into iron pipes. This process will be carried on in a closed building, and any foetid exhalations from the liquid during the short period it remains exposed to the atmosphere will be conveyed into the furnace of the steam-engine. Any silt deposited in the well by the running water will likewise be removed from the well within this covered building, and precautions may easily be taken for washing, and ultimately disinfecting it, before it is carried out. The practice at present is to shovel it by hand labour from the bed of the open sewer upon the bank, where it lies until it is purchased by the builders to make up into mortar. The witnesses generally concur in stating that no other solid matter will be deposited by the running water of the drain. At any rate, the quantity will be so small as to be easily disposed of, without annoyance to the neighbourhood. The station-house will act, therefore, be a cause of nuisance, and the liquid will be removed in a far less offensive state than that in which it is now found, when backed in the open sewer by the high tide, and stagnating for hours together in the immediate vicinity of an inhabited district, to be afterwards poured forth at low tide into the open bed of the river.

The only danger or inconvenience, therefore, which can accrue to the inhabitants is from the breakage of pipes, or from the ultimate distribution of the sewage water upon the land.

Your committee are convinced that sewage water is neither corrosive in its nature, nor liable to generate explosive gases. It may, therefore, be as safely conveyed in iron pipes as the water of the Thames now is by the several water companies; and the general testimony of witnesses, both favourable and unfavourable to the scheme, leads your committee to believe, that when pipes are laid down in a hard, solid road, fractures are of rare occurrence. With the exception of the new ground between the station-house of the Company and Belgrave-square, the proposed line is entirely of that character. With the view, therefore, of avoiding all new ground in public thoroughfares, your committee recommend that instead of pursuing the route proposed in the Bill, the pipes should be carried from the mouths of the sewers along the bank of the Thames, to or beyond Battersea Bridge, from whence they may strike off into the country, without exposing the more thickly inhabited part of the town to the unnecessary annoyance of having their roadways broken up.

With regard to the application of the metropolitan sewage water to the land, your committee are satisfied that it is diluted to so great an extent that its application to the land will be less offensive than that of manure in its solid state.

Having thus disposed of all serious objections to the proposal of the Metropolitan Sewage Manure Company, your committee cannot conclude their report without urging upon the House the importance of a project which proposes at all times to carry away the drainage at the level of low tides, and to remove from the Thames the daily increasing refuse of London. It is true that this measure has lost something of its efficiency, in consequence of the abandonment of the reservoirs. The result of this concession is, that no more sewage can be drawn at any time from the drains than can be disposed of at the moment to the agriculturist; but even this comparatively imperfect measure will try a great experiment, and if the confident expectations of your committee are accomplished, it will not fail ultimately to realise all the advantages which were originally contemplated. Mr. Dickenson has proved the efficiency of liquid manures. The meadows of Edinburgh and of Mansfield have shown the power of sewage water. Mr. Thompson, of Clitheroe, and Mr. Harvey, of Glasgow, have established the fact that liquid manure may be applied at a cheap rate, by means of the mechanical contrivance of service-pipes and hoses, to crops in every stage of their growth.

There will be found individuals, no doubt, in this country of enterprise, to give further development to each of these experiments; but it is only through the agency of a company that they may be all combined, and applied to the important purposes of cleansing our towns, purifying our rivers, and enriching our soil.

It is under these impressions that your committee recommend the proposed Bill, with the following modifications and provisions, to the favourable consideration of your honourable House:—

- 1st. That a line should be adopted for the main pipe along the bank or bed of the river, to or beyond Battersea Bridge, instead of the proposed line.
- 2nd. That the state should reserve to itself the power of resuming its entire property in the sewage, after a certain period, upon conditions to be specified in the Bill.

3rd. That the power now specially reserved to the Commissioners of Sewers should be extended to any authority which may hereafter be entrusted with the management of the sewers.

4th. That clauses be introduced into the Bill providing for the security of the public against any accidents arising from breaking or leakage of the pipes.

5th. That nothing contained in the Act shall exempt the company from liability to the present legal remedies against nuisances.

6th. That nothing contained in the Bill shall exempt the company from the supervision and control of any authority which shall hereafter be established for such purposes.

A PRACTICAL COMMENTARY

ON

By WILLIAM HUGHES, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

Different construction of the same words when contained in a deed than when contained in a will.—The law has always allowed a more liberal construction in favour of a will than a deed; because, in the exposition of the former, the law has rather inclined to regard the intention of the testator, than the precise legal import of the terms he has employed to express it (Loseacres v. Blight, Cow. 326): wills being so often made when a testator is on his death-bed, and unable to obtain that professional assistance of which a party to a deed may generally avail himself. Hence, even previously to the late Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26), which enables a testator to pass an estate in fee-simple without any words of limitation (sec. 28), an estate in fee-simple would, where the intent was manifest, have passed without words of limitation: an estate tail without words of procreation, and an estate either in fee in tail, or for life (Tilley v. Collyer, 3 Keb. 589; Fowler v. Backwell, Com. 353; Moore dem. Pagge v. Heaseman, Wils. 38; Toovey v. Bassett, 10 East, 460), in tail (Langley v. Baldwin, 1 P. Wms. 759; Stanley v. Lennard, 1 Eden, 87; Attertony-General v. Sutton, 3 Bro. P. C. 75; Doe dem. Bean v. Halley, 8 T. R. 5; Mackel v. Wooding, 6 Sim. 4), (Year Book, 13 Hen. 7, fol. 17; Bro. lev. fol. 521; 8 Ven. 214, pl. 5; 2 Freem. 270; T. Jones, 98; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 197; City of London v. Garway, 2 Vern. 572; Hutton v. Simpson, 1b. 723; S. C. under the name of Simpson v. Hornsby, Gibb. Eq. Rep. 115; Dashwood v. Peyton, 18 Ves. 40; Dyer v. Dyer, 1 Mer. 414; Doe dem. Driver and Another v. Bowling, 5 B. & Ald. 722), accordingly as the intention was apparent, might have been raised by implication, without any direct terms of devise whatever. Real property also may pass, although no mention whatever is made of it, as where a testator appoints a person to be his heir. (Inkerdai's Case, Bro. Dev. 38; Taylor v. Webb, Sty. 301; S. C. under the name of Marret v. Sly, 2 Sid. 75; Tilley v. Collyer, 3 Keb. 589.) The Will Act above alluded to (1 Vict. c. 26), has extended this liberal construction still further, as I shall by and by notice; but as this enactment does not affect wills made prior to January, 1838, it will be necessary, first of all, to ascertain how the law stands independently of that Act, in order to see how titles may be affected by wills made previously, as also to ascertain what important changes it has accomplished; and how titles will be affected by wills now brought within its operation.

When the fee would have passed without words of inheritance.—In a deed, if lands had been limited to a man generally without words of limitation, he would have taken a life estate only; with the single exception of a gift to a man and his wife in frankmarriage, which would have raised an estate tail (Lit. s. 17; Wood's Ins. 120); but no other gift or grant, even though it were expressive of the estate the grantor intended to pass, as to the grantee in fee-simple, would have conferred more than a life interest. But in a will, as Lord Coke observes (Lord Cheyne's Case, 5 Rep. 68), the intention of the testator is to be the pole star to guide the judges in the exposition; in which respect it differs from a deed, where the rule of construction is that the words must follow the intent of the testator. When, therefore, this intention has appeared, the courts have allowed terms descriptive both of the subject and the testator's interest therein to pass them both. In other instances they have allowed untechnical expressions to supply the place of proper words of limitation; and where the intent has been manifest, the fee has been raised by implication. So where lands have been devised without words of limitation, but subjected to a charge; or the devise was directed to give or forego any benefit, it would have conferred the fee upon him; and whenever a testator directed a thing to be done, which a mere life estate might be unable to carry into effect, the fee would have passed in precisely the same manner as if the regular words of limitation had been annexed to the devise. And whenever lands were devised without words of limitation, but the devisee had an absolute power of disposition conferred upon him, he was construed to take an estate commensurate with his power.

Words capable of passing both the subject and the testator's interest therein.—A learned judge once said (Wilmot, J. in Scott v. Alberry, Com. 337), that whenever it appeared plainly that a testator intended to devise a fee, it is immaterial what words he makes use of. Hence certain words have been permitted not only to be descriptive of the subject, but also to embrace all the testator's interest therein. Thus the word "estate," (Wilson v. Robinson, 2 Lev. 91, 1 Mod. 100; Reeves v. Winnington, 3 Mod. 45; Hyley v. Hyley, ib. 228; Moor v. Price, 3 Keb. 49; Carver v. Horner, 1 Show. 349; Lane v. Hawkins, 1 Show. 396; Bridgewater (Countess of) v. Bolton (Duke of), 1 Salk. 236; Hopewell v. Ackland, ib. 239; Murray v. Wise, 2 Vern. 564; Beachcroft v. Beachcroft, ib. 690; Shaw v. Bull, 12 Mod. 594; Cliffe v. Gibbons, 2 Lord Raym. 1324; Scott v. Alberry, Com. 337; Barry v. Edgeworth, 2 P. Wms. 523; Chester v. Painter, ib. 235; Ibbetson v. Beckwith, Cas. temp. Talb. 157; Tanner v. Wise, ib. 284, S. C. 3 P. Wms. 295; Tuffnell v. Page, 2 Atk. 38; Timewell v. Perkins, ib. 102; Ridout v. Pains, 3 ib. 486, S. C. 1 Ves. sen. 10; Baileys v. Gale, 2 ib. 48; Macarree v. Tall, Amb. 181; Stiles dem. Rayment v. Walford, 2 W. Blackst. 938; Armiter's case, Lloft. 95; Chesteron v. Chesteron, ib. 106; Holdfast dem. Cooper v. Marten, 1 T. R. 411; Burkett v. Chapman, 1 H. Blackst. 2231; Fletcher v. Smiton, 2 T. R. 656; Doe dem. Morris v. Underdown, Willes, 296; Doe v. Woodhouse, 4 T. R. 89; Doe dem. Child v. Wright, 8 ib. 64; S. C. 1 Bos. & Pull. N. R. 335; Chichester v. Orenden, 4 Taunt. 176; 4 Dow. 92; Uthwaite v. Bryant, 6 Taunt. 317; Jongema v. Jongema, 1 Cox, 362; Doe dem. Dacre (Lady) v. Roper, 11 East, 518; Roe dem. Child v. Wright, 7 East, 259; Price v. Gibson, 2 Eden. 115; Roe dem. Allport v. Bacon, 4 M. & S. 346; Pettward v. Prescott, 7 Ves. 541; Wilkinson v. Robinson, 1 Taunt. & Brod. 172; Doe dem. Penwarden v. Gilbert, 3 Bro. & Bing. 85; Charlton v. Taylor, 3 Ves. & Bea. 160; Gardner v. Harding, 3 Moore, 565), or any corresponding term, has been held sufficient to pass the fee; and although a local description be added, "as my estate in or at A" (Barry v. Edgeworth, 2 P. Wms. 523; Ibbetson v. Beckwith, Cas. temp. Talb. 157; Tuffnell v. Page, 2 Atk. 37; Macarree v. Tall, Amb. 181; Holdfast dem. Cooper v. Marten, 1 T. R. 140; Doe dem. Child v. Wright, 8 T. R. 64; Uthwaite v. Bryant, 6 Taunt. 317; Randall v. Tuckin, 6 Taunt. 410; Denn dem. Richardson v. Hood, 7 Taunt. 35); or my estate of A (Chichester v. Orenden, 4 Taunt. 176; S. C. on appeal, 4 Dow. 92; Gardiner v. Harding, 3 Moore, 565; Pethward v. Prescott, 7 Ves. 541), it will be insufficient to confine the devise to the subject, but will embrace the whole of the testator's interest therein. Neither would an additional description annexed to the word "estate," have restricted its general import, as "all that estate I bought of M" (Baileys v. Gale, 2 Ves. sen. 48), or, "all my freehold estate, consisting of thirty acres of land more or less, and all erections of the said farm, situate, &c." (Gardiner v. Harding, 3 Moore, 565), or, "all my estate, lands, &c. called or known by the name of the coal-yard, in the parish of St. Giles, London." (Roe dem. Child v. Wright, 7 East, 259.) The word "estates" in the plural number, whatever doubt may once have been entertained on the subject (as to which see Goodwyn v. Goodwyn, 1 Ves. sen. 226), it is now determined, will receive the same construction as the word "estate" in the singular. (Macarree v. Tall, Amb. 181; Tilley v. Simpson, in a note to Fletcher v. Smiton, 2 T. R. 656; Fletcher v. Smiton, ib.; Jongema v. Jongema, 1 Cox, 362; Randall v. Tuckin, 6 Taunt. 410; Roe dem. Allport v. Bacon, 4 Mau. & Selw. 366.)

When the comprehensive import of the word estate may be restricted.—But the word "estate," notwithstanding its comprehensive import, may yet be restricted to a more limited meaning when it is obvious that such was the testator's intent. Hence, where he confines it to an express life estate, as occurred in the case of Price v. Gibson (2 Eden, 115), where the testator devised all his estate at C H, to A for life, remainder to B and C, which was held to pass a life estate only to A. So where a devise was of "my real estate at B," with limitations in strict settlement. (Hodges v. Middleton, Doug. 415; Brues v. Beisbridge, 5 Moore, 1; 1 Bro. & Bing. 123.) The word "estate" may also be restrained to mean things of the same kind with which it is associated. If, therefore, it be coupled with articles of a personal kind, it will be considered to relate to personality only. Hence, where a testator, after a specific devise of a real estate called Whiteacre, devised "all the residue of his leases, mortgages, estates, debts, moneys, and other goods, &c." the word "estates" was held to be confined to the chattels only. (Wilkinson v. Abernyland, Cro. Car. 447; S. C. 1 Eq. Ca. Abr. 178.) In Timewell v. Perkins also (2 Atk. 102) a limitation of "all other, the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, consisting of ready money, plate, jewels, leases, judgments, and mortgages," was confined to the kind of property with which it was thus associated, and of which the testator expressly stated it to have consisted. Yet, for all this, the mere circumstance of the word "estate" being in the same sentence with an enumeration of chattels, will not so inseparably connect itself with them as to deprive that term of its more comprehensive signification. If inserted so as to precede the enumeration it may yet relate to real estate not previously disposed of (Fletcher v. Smiton, 2 T. R. 656; Tanner v. Morris, Cas. temp. Talb. 284); and even if inserted after an enumeration or description of chattels sufficient to comprehend the whole personal property, the construction will be the same, and when thus extended to real estate it will comprehend the entire interest of the testator therein (Terrell v. Page, 1 Eq. Ca. Abr. 209, c. 11; Scott v. Alberry, Com. 337; Tilley v. Simpson, stated 2 T. R. 659, n.; Jongema v. Jongema, 1 Cox, 362; Doe dem. Beane v. Evans, 9 Ad. & Ell. 719), upon the principle laid down by Lord Chancellor Talbot in Ibbetson v. Beckwith (Cas. temp. Talb. 157), where he says that if the words of the will be general, and taking the testator's words in one sense will make the will to be a complete disposition of the whole; whereas, taking them in another, it will create a chasm, they shall be taken in that sense which is most likely to be agreeable to his intention of disposing of his whole estate.

Other words capable of passing both the subject and the testator's interest therein.—The word "estate," is not the only one which will comprehend both the subject and the absolute interest; for the word "property," unless restrained by the context, will be of equal force with the word "estate" (Doe v. Lanchbury, 11 East, 290; Doe dem. Dacre v. Rohn, ib. 518; Nicholls v. Butcher, 18 Ves. 193; Roe v. Pattison, 16 East, 221; Patton v. Randall, 1 Jac. & Walk. 189; see also Doe, lessee of Wall v. Langlands, 14 East, 371; Noel v. Hays, 5 Mad. 38). But the word "property," like the word "estate," when coupled and associated with chattels, will be construed to relate to personal property only. (Bunney v. Rout, 7 Taunt. 79.) A reversion (Baileys v. Gale, 2 Ves. sen. 48), or remainder (Norton v. Ludd, 1 Latw. 755) may also be devised by those appellations, which will pass, and the whole interest of the testator, as well as the subject. So a devise of "my moiety of the house in which A. lives," will pass the absolute interest of the testator. (Doe dem. Atkinson v. Fawcett, 7 Law T. 283.) As will also a devise of all my "right, title, and interest" (Cole v. Rawlinson, 1 Lord Raym. 331, 1 Salk. 234); or, "all my part, share, and interest" (Andrew v. Southhouse, 5 T. R. 592); or "all I am worth;" (Hustep v. Brooman, 1 Bro. C. C. 437; cited and approved of by Lord C. J. Gibbs, in Doe v. Rout, 7 Taunt. 81); or "all that I shall be possessed of, real and personal" (Pitman v. Stevens, 15 East, 505; Wilce v. Wilce, 7 Bing. 664; Thomas v. Phelps, 4 Russ. 348); or, "whatever else I have in the world, not before disposed of" (Hopewell v. Ackland, Com. 164, Cas. temp. Talb. 286), will pass the fee-simple in the property to which those words are annexed. But it must at the same time be kept in view, that none of the terms last alluded to will pass the fee, unless they are contained in the devising clause of the will. If used simply in the introductory clause, they will not (as to wills made prior to 1838) vary the construction of a devise afterwards made, if the expressions in the devising clause are insufficient to carry the degree of interest contended for. (Lovecree v. Blight, Cow. 152; Wright v. Russell, cited ib. 659; Wright v. Wright, 2 Wils. 114; Denn v. Gaskin, Com. 659; Right v. Sidebottom, Doug. 734.) And, notwithstanding an estate in remainder or reversion will pass by that appellation, yet the usual terms, "rest, residue, and remainder," as relating to residuary property undisposed of by the will, will not (except as to wills made after 1838), be capable of enlarging any devise of real estate to which they may relate, beyond a mere life interest. (Canning v. Canning, Mosel. 240; Denn dem. Moor v. Mellor, 5 T. R. 502; Doe dem. Small v. Allen, 8 T. R. 147.) The word "inheritance" is sufficient of itself to pass the fee, (Widlake v. Harding, Hob. 2; Purefoy v. Rogers, 2 Saund. 388), as is also the word "fee-simple" (Baker v. Raymond, Anders. 51; Bro. der. C; Gilb. der. 18; Perk. s. 557; 2 Bla. Com. 108); but the word "hereditaments," though strictly applicable only to an estate of inheritance, will not have that effect (Hopewell v. Ackland, Salk. 338; Canning v. Canning, Mos. 240; Doe dem. Palmer v. Richards, 3 T. R. 356; Doe dem. Small v. Allen, 8 T. R. 147); neither will the word "lands" standing alone be sufficient, although the word freehold be adjunct to it. (Lee v. Withers, T. Jones, 10; Wilson v. Robinson, 2 Wilson, 91; Denn dem. Moor v. Mellor, 5 T. R. 558; Doe dem. Norris v. Tucker, 3 B. & A. 471; Doe dem. Ashley v. Baines, 2 C. M. & R. 23.)

Import of the word "effects."—The word "effects" is a term of rather equivocal import, yet, upon the whole, more applicable to personal than to real property (Campfield v. Gilbert, 3 East, 519; Hick v. Dring, 2 Man. & Selw. 455; see also Doe dem. Chilcot v. White, 1 East, 33; Macnamara v. Whitworth (Lord), Coop. 241; Rawlings v. Jennings, 13 Ves. 39); but if the term "real" (Doe v. Clark, 2 Bos. & Pull. N.R. 243; Hogan dem. Wallis v. Jackson, Cow. 29; Doe v. Lainchbury, 11 East, 290); or "testamentary" (Doe dem. Penwarden v. Gilbert, 2 Bro. & Bing. 85) be annexed to it; or from the general context it appears that the testator intended to apply it to real property, then not only will it be allowed to pass such property, but the absolute interest therein also. (Doe v. Lainchbury, 11 East, 290.)

SALE OF SHARES OF THE GLOBE EVENING NEWSPAPER.—On Thursday, nineteen shares of the Globe Evening Newspaper, the property of which consists of sixty-two shares, were disposed of by auction, by Mr. Edward Robins, at the Auction Mart, which attracted a large number of literary gentlemen, connected with the daily and periodical journals, the majority of whom, however, left the room, upon the sale of the first lot. The shares were the property of the principal proprietor, who, having reached the age of eighty-two, was desirous of relieving himself from the care of the pursuit of literature. The shares were severally divided into lots, of which the first four were purchased by Mr. Aldridge, and the remaining fifteen were bought by Mr. Ridgway, publisher, Piccadilly. The following were the prices each lot went for:—No. 1, 850 guineas; No. 2, 790 guineas; No. 3, 750 guineas; No. 4, 700 guineas; and the other lots at 660 guineas each. The pre-emption price per share, was in 1846, 1,540l. realizing a dividend of 180l.; in 1845, 1,230l. the dividend being 120l.; and in 1844, 872l. yielding a dividend of 100l. The total amount the shares produced was 12,990 guineas.

THE LAW DIGEST.—A complete Index to all the Reports that appeared during the Half-year ending the 1st of January last. Price 5s. 6d. in a stout wrapper. To be continued half-yearly.

"This laborious undertaking is intended to supply the practitioner with a ready reference to all the law decided during the half-year ending on the 1st of January, and it is, if successful, to be continued half-yearly. The plan is simple and convenient. All the cases reported during the half year are arranged under their proper subjects, and these are placed alphabetically. If, therefore, the practitioner wants to ascertain what cases have been decided, say on the law of "Executors," he turns to that title, and under it he will find every case, whereover reported, briefly digested with reference to the report or reports, if more than one, where it appears. Besides this, there is an index to the names of cases, and to the names both of defendants and plaintiffs, so that if one be forgotten the case may still be traced by means of the other. The peculiarity of this work, and that in which it differs from any other digest, is, that it includes all the reports, whereas all the other digests exclude some, being guided in their selection, not by the wants of the practitioner, but according to the rivalries of publishers. The plan of this digest is to omit none, and its consequent completeness gives it a peculiar value and utility. The amount of exclusion from the other digests may be judged by this, that the Digest before us, although embracing the reports only for half-a-year, contains more cases than does either of the others for a whole year, and the mere index of the names of the cases digested occupies no less than twenty-four closely printed columns. There is also a table of the statutes cited, arranged in chronological order."

"It will not become us to express an opinion upon the merits of this publication. We can only give a description of it, leaving it to the reader from that description to determine whether it is likely to be an acquisition to his office."

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

HEMING V. DINGWALL.

Practice—Dismissal of bill for want of prosecution—114th order of May, 1845—Due diligence—Costs. Where it appears that the plaintiff has been diligent in prosecuting his suit during the latter portion of the time which has elapsed since filing the bill, and that the defendant cannot be delayed by giving the plaintiff leave to proceed with his suit, notwithstanding a slip in practice, which, in strictness, would entitle the defendant to have the bill dismissed, the plaintiff will be allowed to proceed upon the terms of paying all the costs incurred through his error.

This was a motion by way of appeal from an order of the Vice-Chancellor of England refusing the application of the plaintiff to enlarge the time to pass publication.

Willcocks, for the motion.—Publication had passed on the 14th of February, 1846; and on the 19th of February, the plaintiff gave notice of motion to enlarge publication, upon the ground that the solicitor had made a slip, from supposing that the calculation of time was to be made by calendar and not by lunar months, and also that the proceedings had in part been taken under the old practice. The solicitor's clerk stated by affidavit that he had been constantly and assiduously employed in prosecuting the suit; and that, having twelve witnesses to examine, he found no appointment could be made with the examiner before the 16th of March, and that no intention of delay existed. By the old rules of practice, publication would not have passed. The bill was filed by the executors of the late Mr. M'William, to restrain the defendant from prosecuting an action he had commenced against the plaintiffs to recover the sum of 13,000*l.* claimed to have been due from the testator to the defendant as a master builder. The bill alleged that the defendant was the mere servant of the late Mr. M'William, at a weekly salary, and sought an account and discovery of all transactions between them. The replication in the cause had been filed in June 1846, under the old orders. There had been found to be a difficulty in such cases under the new orders, which came into operation on the 28th of October, 1845, and the Court had directed new replication to be filed. Upon the appeal motion, a new affidavit had been filed, setting forth day by day what steps had been taken in the prosecution of the suit. The only effect of dismissing the present bill would be to compel the plaintiff to file a new bill. No time had been lost, for the motion had been heard before the Vice-Chancellor on the 25th of March, and the petition of appeal was presented on the 27th of March.

Romilly and Southgate opposed the motion.—They contended the case was not one for indulgence. The mistake by the plaintiff's solicitor in the practice of the court, by calculating lunar for calendar months, afforded no reason why the Court should interpose. Practitioners were bound to be acquainted with the practice of the Court. By the 12th Order of May 1845, it was expressly provided that, "when the time for doing any act or taking any proceeding is limited by months not expressed to be calendar months, such time is to be computed by lunar months of twenty-eight days each." The answer of the defendant had been put in on the 10th of August, 1844, and on the 18th of December following the common injunction was dissolved, and no material step had been taken by the plaintiff till the 20th of December, 1845. Then he began to proceed actively, but great part of the subsequent time had been occupied by the plaintiff in examining the books, accounts, and papers produced by the defendant. These papers had all been scheduled to the defendant's answer, and the plaintiff might, at any time during the twelve months he allowed the suit to rest, have obtained production of them. The plaintiff's case, if true, was good as a defence at law, and in truth the great part of the time stated by the plaintiff to have been occupied in preparing evidence was with reference to the defence of the action.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I pay no attention to the apology for delay offered by the plaintiff, that his solicitor mistook the practice, and calculated the time by calendar instead of lunar months. It is the duty of solicitors to know what is the practice of the Court; and I wish the profession to understand, that whatever may be the consequence to their clients, an error in practice can furnish no claim to the indulgence of the Court. But what I go upon in this case is, that it does appear that there has been an accidental slip or error, and that the plaintiff has exercised all proper diligence during the latter part of the time in which this suit has been pending. Then, having regard to the period of the year, it does appear that the defendant could not possibly get rid of the suit sooner. Solicitors must not speculate upon indulgence in consequence of slips in practice, although, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, the indulgence will be granted on the terms of the plaintiff paying the costs of the motion; the publication to be enlarged to the first day of Michaelmas Term.

Romilly asked that the plaintiff should be required to pay the costs of a motion by the defendant to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution now pending before the Vice-Chancellor.

Willcocks.—That is not now before the Court; the question of the costs of that motion must be left to the Vice-Chancellor.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The defendant's notice of motion to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution was given on the 27th of February. Defendant was not bound to wait the result of this appeal; the plaintiff's motion had been refused by the Vice-Chancellor. The plaintiff should indemnify the defendant against all costs which have arisen from the plaintiff's error. I make the payment of the costs of the pending motion a condition of the present order. There will be but one order.

Order reversed.

HARDY V. HARDY.

Practice—Dismissal of bill not ordered where suit kept in abeyance upon a mutual understanding between the plaintiff and the principal defendant.

Time allowed by the plaintiff's solicitor to communicate with his client in a distant part of the world, when the defendant, in violation of the understanding, had moved to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution.

Fooks moved to discharge an order made by the Vice-Chancellor of England, by which the plaintiff was required to file a replication within a week, or otherwise that his bill should be dismissed, that the plaintiff should be at liberty to proceed with the cause, and that the costs of the motions should be costs in the cause.

The bill was filed in 1842 by the tenant in tail in remainder against his father, who was tenant for life in possession. The object of the suit was to get the title-deeds into court, for an account of wood sold by the defendant, and to have the produce invested according to the terms of the settlement. After the answer had been put in, and some of the requirements of the bill had been complied with by the father, certain explanations took place between the father and son, and it was felt not to be desirable to prosecute the suit, and it was understood that no further proceedings should be had therein on either side. The son, the plaintiff, then went to New Zealand, without leaving any instructions with his solicitor, or otherwise communicating with him save by a letter dated on shipboard off Gravesend, informing him of his intended departure. The plaintiff now remains in New Zealand. In Feb. 1845, the defendant, the father, moved to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution, and on the affidavit of plaintiff's solicitor to the effect above mentioned, the Vice-Chancellor allowed the motion to stand over for a year, to give him an opportunity of communicating with his client. In Feb. 1846, the defendant renewed the motion, and the Vice-Chancellor then made the order now sought to be discharged. The new orders direct only one replication to be filed, and here the answers of several defendants had not been got in. It was impossible to comply with the Vice-Chancellor's order. The suit was rendered necessary by the father's misconduct, and then the father having done great part of what was asked for by the bill, the suit was suspended.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—As you state the matter, the suit may never be disposed of.

Fooks.—The plaintiff's solicitor has now received instructions from his client to prosecute the suit, and it will be proceeded with without delay.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Your apology for the delay is, that in consequence of that understanding the suit was abandoned.

Fooks.—Yes. The defendant cannot proceed in violation of the arrangement he had assented to. (Blandhard v. Drew, 10 Sim. 240; Stagg v. —, 3 Harv's Reports, .)

Baily, for the defendant, offered that the bill should be dismissed without costs.

Fooks.—The plaintiff's solicitor has no authority to make such an arrangement; besides, the suit was again necessary, as the defendant was still improperly disposing of wood on the estate.

Baily.—It is useless to carry on the suit.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I cannot now enter into that; I cannot judge of the merits of the case. The case put by the plaintiff's counsel is, that the matter stood over on an understanding, and that the defendant took advantage of the plaintiff's absence, and moved to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution.

Baily.—Why should the defendant be kept before the Court for ever? The time elapsed was wholly unaccounted for by the plaintiff, and he was only entitled to the strict course of practice, which, under the new orders, was to require the plaintiff to file a replication within a week. The notice of motion goes to leave to amend; but it is now settled that application for that purpose must in the first instance be made to the Master.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—What I want explained is, whether the defendant misled the plaintiff so as to prevent him from proceeding with activity. He knew the plaintiff had gone to New Zealand; and the several arrangements which took place sufficiently explain why the suit was not proceeded with. An arrangement having been made with the principal defendant, the plaintiff did not proceed to get in the answers of the other defendants. I don't see that the defendant sufficiently explains that. Something was done which disarmed the plaintiff.

Baily.—Nothing has been done since the defendant's answer was put in.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (after looking at the affidavit of the plaintiff's solicitor).—This affidavit was made on the application to the Vice-Chancellor, and there has been no other affidavit filed. The solicitor has received a communication, which is, that he is simply to go on with the suit. The affidavit merely says, that the solicitor had no instructions, the Vice-Chancellor yielded to that, and allowed the motion to stand over for a year.

Fooks, in reply.—The defendant's renewed misconduct has rendered it necessary that the suit should go on.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—There is nothing to shew that there has been any delay since the plaintiff's solicitor has received a communication from his client. The Vice-Chancellor's order is, that the plaintiff reply within a week; that is impossible, and is tantamount to an immediate dismissal of the bill. There is reason to suspect, from the affidavit, that there is not much of substance left to be done in the suit, but there is nothing to prevent the suit from being put in a position to be prosecuted. The plaintiff must undertake to get in the answers and file a replication by the first day of Michaelmas Term. The plaintiff had to ask for an indulgence, and must pay the costs of the appeal. The costs before the Vice-Chancellor must be costs in the cause.

BUSINESS OF THE WEEK.

Wednesday, July 22.

The LORD CHANCELLOR stated, that, as the practice of not sitting after July had been established by his predecessor, he would, for this year, not sit later than the 31st of July; but that, in future, the period of sitting would depend upon the state of the business of the Court. His Lordship stated, that after all motions and petitions had been disposed of, he should proceed with the causes until the rising of the Court on the 31st of July instant.

VICE-CHANCELLOR KNIGHT
BRUCE'S COURT.

June 24, 25, 26, and July 11.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. PEARSON.

Parish officers—Application of parish funds. Where parish officers had placed an alleged lunatic pauper in the workhouse under circumstances which, in the opinion of the Court, justified their interference, and a verdict with damages had subsequently been obtained against them in an action for false imprisonment, and the damages and costs had been charged against the parish, and the accounts had been allowed in open ventry, the Court, under all the circumstances of the case, dismissed, without costs, an information filed against the officers upon the relation of two of the ratepayers, seeking to charge the officers personally with the damages and costs in the action.

This was an information filed by Mr. Rae and Mr. Thain against the defendants, who were nine of the trustees elected by virtue of the 5th Geo. 4, c. 125—a local Act for the administration of the affairs of the parish of Islington—and Mr. Oldershaw, the clerk to the trustees. The object of the information was to charge the defendants with a breach of trust in applying the sum of 898*l.* 19*s.* 7*d.* out of the fund appropriated for the poor, in payment of the damages and costs of two actions brought in the Court of Common Pleas by James Eliot, who had been confined in the Islington workhouse as an alleged lunatic pauper. The following is an outline of the case:—On the 28th of November, 1842, Mr. Oldershaw received a letter from the clerk of Mr. Greenwood, the police magistrate, requesting his immediate attendance to the case of Eliot, stating that he was decidedly insane, and that Mr. Greenwood considered it a fit case for parochial interference. Mr. Oldershaw forwarded directions to Mr. Hicks, the relieving officer, to inquire into the case. Mr. Hicks having reported that the statements contained in the above-mentioned letter were correct, an order was made out for Eliot's admission into the workhouse. On the following day, Mr. Oldershaw directed a person in the employ of the parish to make further inquiries into Eliot's condition and circumstances, and to take him without violence to the workhouse. This person, accompanied by a man named Bevan took charge of Eliot and his furniture, and, it appearing to them necessary, a straight-waistcoat was obtained from the workhouse, and, after placing it on Eliot, they conveyed him there in a cab. The waistcoat was not removed until the following morning, when it was done by the order of the medical officer. At the end of the week, Eliot was released from the workhouse, and he afterwards brought an action for false imprisonment against three of the trustees, and other persons concerned in taking him to the workhouse, and also an action against Mr. Oldershaw, for having his goods removed from his house to the workhouse. The first action was tried before Chief Justice Tindal, on the 10th of May, 1844, when the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, with 400*l.* damages. Upon a motion for a new trial, the Court, by consent, reduced the damages to 200*l.*, and a stet processus was entered in the second action. Mr. Oldershaw had been directed by the trustees to defend both actions, subject to the control of the committee for general purposes. The payment of these damages and costs was afterwards allowed in open vestry.

An objection was first taken by the defendants for want of parties, there being only nine of the trustees (who were sixty in number), made defendants, but the Court held, that, according to Lord Langdale's construction of the 32nd Order of August, 1841, the objection was not valid.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The information in this case is filed against certain persons, who, with others, were, during the years 1842, 1844, and 1845, or part of that period, concerned in the administration of the parish affairs of Islington, imputing to them a breach of trust in respect of the payment out of the parish funds of two sums of money for the damages and costs on each side in one action, and the costs on one side in the other action; which two actions were brought, in the year 1843, against various of the present trustees by one Eliot, who, in the year 1842, was an inhabitant of the parish, and who appears to have been a person connected with the legal profession, from having been a clerk in the office of a highly respectable solicitor. The answer of the defendants has not been read, and I do not consider it is evidence; but it is right, nevertheless, towards all parties on this record, to be aware and to take notice of the manner in which the defendants state their case on it, so far as relates to the origin of, and bringing, these actions. [His Honour here read the greater part of the defendants' answers, giving a complete history of their proceedings with regard to Eliot.] It has been contended that the suit is defective for want of parties; but as I stated at the close of the argument, having regard to the construction which the 32nd Order of August 1841 has received from one of the judges who signed those orders, it appeared to me then, and I still think, that to treat the suit as defective would be improper; and perhaps, independently of that learned judge's view, I should have come to the same conclusion, though I cannot say that on that point I am perfectly confident. Considering, therefore, that the suit is properly constituted, I do not think it would be right to refuse relief on the ground that the parties proceeded by information, and by information only. I do not think that I am bound to consider the judgment in the case of Eliot v. Allen, or in the other case, either independently of the consent to the rule by which the amount of damages was diminished, or upon the ground and with the aid of that rule, as being for the purposes of the present suit, evidence of the truth of any parts of the facts alleged in the declaration in that action, or of the untruth of the pleas pleaded in it. This question is of course distinct altogether from that of the effect of the judgment, or the rule, or either of them, as between Eliot on the one hand, and the defendants in the action on the other. I am of opinion that it would be equally contrary to principle and authority to say, that in this suit, and for the purposes of this suit, it ought, either on the ground of the judgment or of the rule, to be assumed and taken even prima facie that any fact whatsoever necessary to be proved, in order to sustain that action, had happened or existed. The legal record proves, that upon certain pleadings there was a trial between certain parties; that upon that trial a verdict for the plaintiff had been found, with 400*l.* damages, reduced afterwards by consent to 200*l.*, and that there was judgment accordingly, the costs following the result; but it does not prove the truth of the plaintiff's case for any purposes of the present suit, a suit in which Eliot's rights are not concerned, and with which he has nothing to do, unless so far as from his being, or his having been, a rated inhabitant of the parish, he might, merely as one of the general mass of persons so circumstanced, be said to have some interest; but, of course, when he sued at law, it was in a different right, and in a different character. If the Attorney-General had tendered in evidence what a witness who had been examined and cross-examined at the trial had sworn, for the purpose of proving, not merely that the witness had so sworn, but the fact to which he had sworn, the evidence would not, I apprehend, have been received as evidence of that fact in the present suit. This remark, I think it right to add, although in truth the Court knows little or nothing of the action, except from the charge of the honoured and venerated Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, whose recent loss the whole country with one mind now deplores;—that charge, by consent, has been added to the papers, not to prove any fact, except the mere circumstance that his Lordship did so charge the jury. The counsel for the information appeared to rely considerably upon the consent to reduce the damages to 200*l.*, which of course conceded to Eliot damages to that amount. I think that consent, under the circumstances, is not material. The verdict was not given by consent; its propriety has been disputed by the defendants at law; the rule placed Eliot in a worse position than if the verdict had been untouched. I think myself bound to consider neither the judgment, nor the rule, nor the learned judge's charge, as evidence of the justice or propriety of the action. The nature and effects of the information being such as I have stated, and such being the issues raised by the defendants, I must look for evidence on which to decide it; to the evidence in this particular case alone. Supposing my view in this respect to be correct, how stands the case with respect to Eliot? This part of the case is divisible into three portions in respect of time: the first relating to the interval between the 26th of November, 1842, and his being brought to the workhouse; the second relating to his stay there; and the third, his transit from the workhouse to the court of the police magistrate, and the proceedings there. The acts done during each of those periods, and on each of those occasions cannot, as it appears to be, be justly estimated without due consideration of certain points, which I will proceed to mention, with the view I take of them. First, as to Eliot's apparent state of mind. Upon a careful consideration of the evidence before me, I am satisfied from his language, demeanour, and conduct before and upon the 28th of November, 1842, and on former occasions, and in the interval between that day and the time of his liberation (if that is a correct expression) at the police court on the 6th of the following December, that he was during the whole of that interval, reasonably to be inferred and believed to be in a state of insanity, and likely, if unwatched and unrestrained, to do serious mischief, and unfit, as well on his own account as for the sake of others, to be left unwatched and unrestrained. The next point is as to his means at the time, and I am satisfied, from the situation he was in, and the circumstances in which he was at the time of his reception in the workhouse, and during the whole of his stay there, there was just reason to infer and believe that he was in a state of poverty and destitution; in such a state of poverty and destitution as would render him a proper object of parish relief as a pauper, in the form and manner in which the law then allowed parish relief to be administered to paupers. And as to the order for his admission into the workhouse, it is I think reasonable and unavoidable upon the evidence before me, and I believe and think, that it was granted and issued without any unlawful or improper intention whatever, but on the contrary, that the act of granting and using the order was not merely lawful and proper, but commendable. Having stated thus much, I must address myself more particularly to the first period of time which I have mentioned, and with respect to that period I am satisfied that neither the trustees nor any one of their number, neither Mr. Oldershaw, Mr. Semple, or Mr. Hicks, directed or authorised, or in any sense participated in the act of placing Eliot under restraint for the purpose of removing him to the workhouse, or the act of carrying him to the workhouse; and I am of opinion that I am not bound judicially to believe that Ellis, the master of the workhouse, directed or authorised, or was in any sense a participator in any of those acts. If my view is correct, can it be said in the present case that, had Eliot not been admitted into the workhouse, the trustees, or any one of them, or either of the four persons whose names I have mentioned, could have been properly punished or sued by Eliot, whether sane or insane, unless it were for not admitting him? I exclude for the present all consideration of the question as to Eliot's household goods and apparel. But was it correct to admit him? That question must be answered in the affirmative, and, on the evidence, it was, in my judgment, reasonable and right to receive him into the workhouse on that occasion: his detention there is quite a different matter. Next, as to his stay in the workhouse; I do not believe he was treated there with either inhumanity or neglect, except such neglect as I believe was shown by permitting him the too free use of his hands. He was only 18 or 19 hours in the straight-waistcoat at the most; and it may reasonably be supposed to be a matter of some difficulty and delicacy to decide, without the presence of a medical man, as to the propriety of freeing him from restraint. Whether the continuance of that restraint, or rather his detention in the workhouse, was not strictly justifiable towards him in point of law, is a question on which my mind is perhaps not fully satisfied; but I am of opinion that the whole of these proceedings were taken from the most proper motives on the part of those who were instrumental in the matter, and who acted upon grounds which were reasonable in themselves, and who believed that they were required by law and the discharge of their duty so to act. But, however the case may stand with regard to the other defendants, I am entirely at a loss to conceive how it can be imagined that Mr. Semple had any thing to do with the matter. Mr. Hicks was not an inmate of the house, and had nothing to do with its management. With regard to Eliot's removal from the workhouse to the court of the police magistrate, some observations are applicable; but as I have already mentioned that subject, I shall not repeat them now. Judging, therefore, from the materials in this case, I cannot help doubting whether the action of Eliot v. Allen ought to have been brought; nor can I help thinking that the damages given by the jury were prodigious. In the case Eliot v. Oldershaw, the action was never tried. That action was brought by Eliot, in consequence of the removal of certain goods and wearing apparel belonging to the plaintiff from his house to the workhouse after he had been placed there. Now, that was an act, if not strictly justifiable, evidently done bona fide—an act which a man in Mr. Oldershaw's position would have thought it his duty to do under the particular circumstances of the case. It appears to me that the two actions, connected as the subjects of them were, fell properly under the same consideration. It has not been shown that Mr. Oldershaw acted unskillfully in either of those actions. The event of one action was very adverse, but it is not always right to judge by events, and I do not find that respectable attorneys guarantee verdicts. The resolution of the board was in favour of the defence of the actions, and that resolution was, in my opinion, reasonable and just, and, if it be not superfluous to add, I will say right. That resolution was followed by resolutions of competent parties, that the damages and costs should be paid, and they were paid accordingly. [All these several resolutions his Honour then read.] The object of the information being to compel Mr. Oldershaw and the other defendants to refund respectively, for the benefit of the parish, the sums which have thus been paid out of the parish rates, the question is, whether it is the duty of the Court to enforce that claim. The information was filed on the 3rd of September, 1845, but before that day two vestry meetings had been held, one on the 25th of March, the other on the 6th of June, at neither of which had the rates, out of which these costs and damages had been paid, been disallowed or repealed. Both upon the general law applicable to rates and overseers' accounts, and the 25th section of the Local Act, I am of opinion that it would be an erroneous construction of the general law and of that section, not to provide for damages paid to the plaintiff as well as the costs of the defendants. It is plain that Mr. Oldershaw acted as the officer of the trustees, who adopted his acts. Persons in the official situation of the trustees of their parish have public functions to execute, in the performance of which society is greatly interested. Those functions are frequently not free from difficulty. A great number of ill-judged persons are necessarily placed under their charge, of whom they have to take care as well in sickness as in health, and in the discharge of those extensive functions the public have a right to expect from them prudent and proper conduct. Among the great number of persons placed by law under their care, and who must necessarily be subjected to some control, all must be liable to diseases of some kind—to disease from which neither rich nor poor are exempt: among these there may often be, and often is, the fearful calamity of madness—a disease of varying and uncertain symptoms, with respect to which any carelessness may lead to painful, to the most lamentable, consequences. The authority to be exercised in cases of this description presents the parties—to borrow a word from Lord Ellenborough—with a “hazardous alternative.” But what are parties in the position of these trustees to do? What is to be done by public officers in a case where the existence of this malady is suspected? If he were treated erroneously, he might, if insane, commit enormous and fatal extravagances for which, not he, but those who should have restrained him, would be amenable. The protection of men having to perform, and to the best of their judgment meaning to perform, a public duty under such circumstances, whether as principals or agents, ought not to be considered a matter of slight consideration, and ought to be the subject of provision by law as careful and complete as may be consistent with the rights of individuals who complain of being improperly treated. On these principles, I believe the acts of the defendants ought to be interpreted and considered. What I have now said will suffice to dispose of the case. It has been contended that relief must be granted against the defendants, if the case of the Attorney-General v. Compton, decided by me in 1842, was rightly decided. I have read the report of that case, and I wish to say that I am not certain whether I expressed myself exactly as the report shows that I am considered to have expressed myself; very probably I did so; but assuming that I did so, it appears to me that my decision in that case, and my decision in the present case, are perfectly compatible. The correctness of the case alluded to has not, indeed, been questioned at the bar, a circumstance fairly deserving attention, as may be also the fact that the defendant's counsel in that case declined stating a case for the opinion of a court of law, which I understood was declined after deliberation. The decree has not been appealed from. Whether, however, it is correct, both legally and equitably, is probably a question reasonably open to argument and to difference of opinion—a question not free from difficulty upon grounds including the fact that, as I believe, a rate had been made upon the foundation of estimates comprising a disputed payment, and had not been quashed, amended, or altered. I am not, however, by any means convinced that the decree was erroneous; nor, assuming its perfect correctness, does it, as I conceive, rule or govern the present case. I think the present information ought to be dismissed. I dismiss it, because I think the acts of which complaint has been made, were acts which, whether wholly legal or wholly illegal, or in part legal, and in part illegal, ought to be considered as the acts of the trustees of the parish of Islington in that capacity, and ought on the evidence to be considered as acts done, bona fide, without any wrong intended, either on the part of themselves, their agents, or their servants. I believe, on the contrary, that they have all acted with the best intentions; I believe that they acted justly, and in the execution of the duties which they considered incumbent upon them, under the local Act. I believe that they have acted with judgment, diligence, and honesty. Upon the question of the costs of the suit, I have doubted much; but upon the ground, mainly, if not solely, that the verdict in the action of Eliot v. Allen, and the result of the proceedings at law, created probably against the conduct of the trustees and their officers, an impression, which though in my judgment erroneous, I cannot consider as not excusable, I have determined to dismiss the information without costs; if the relators will consent that if, in the event of an appeal, the Court of Appeal shall deem it just to dismiss the information with costs, they will not bring a cross appeal. Whatever may be the fate of this information, in the Court of Chancery, or the House of Lords, I trust that there may be found, in this opulent parish, the will to indemnify, and, consistently with the law, the means of indemnifying the defendants from the expense of the suit out of its public funds.

Sir F. Simpsonson, on behalf of the relators, stated that they were willing to give the undertaking suggested by the Court, and the information was accordingly dismissed without costs.

WEATHERBY v. ST. GEORGIO.

Alien—Probate duty—Legacy duty.

Legacy duty is not payable upon property in this country belonging to an alien when he is domiciled abroad at the time of his death, and by his will bequeaths his English property to alien legatees residing abroad.

Probate duty is payable upon property of an alien in England, notwithstanding he may have died abroad and bequeathed the property to alien legatees.

This was a suit for the administration of the estate of a testator named John St. Georgio, under a decree of the Court. The testator, who was an Italian by birth, made his will, and appointed the plaintiff his executor of his estate and effects in England, and other persons executors of his estate and effects in Italy, and, after directing all his debts to be paid in England, he directed the plaintiff to transmit all the residue of his property in England to his executors in Italy, to be distributed with his other property there amongst certain legatees named in his will. The usual references were made to the Master to take the account and state special circumstances; the Master made his report, and, amongst other things, found that the testator was resident and domiciled at Monza, near Milan, in Italy, at the time of his death, and that the parties entitled to have the residue distributed amongst them were also resident in, and natives of, Italy. The cause now came on upon further directions, and one of the points raised was, whether both probate and legacy duty were payable in respect to the residuary estate transmitted from this country to Italy.

Kenyon, Parker, Tinney, Walker, and Rogers, appeared for the several parties.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—It being necessary to prove the will here for the purpose of collecting the estate, the residue in question is clearly liable to probate duty, but no legacy duty is payable upon that which is transmitted to Italy for distribution.

HUNTER v. NOCKHOLDS.

Practice—Demurrer—Answer—Orders, 26th August, 1841—Exceptions.

Where a defendant, by his answer, makes a defence, which would support a demurrer to the discovery sought by the bill, and asks the same benefit of his defence, as if he had taken it by demurrer, he may decline to give the discovery sought.

The plaintiff in this suit, who is a creditor of Sir Francis Vincent, bart. filed this bill against the defendant Nockholds, Sir Francis Vincent, and others, and prayed, amongst other matters, an account of property which had been mortgaged, and also of other incumbrances charged thereupon, and an injunction to restrain Nockholds (who was the receiver of the rents) from paying any moneys which might have come to or remain in his hands since the year 1835, in respect of such rent, or in respect of timber sold without the order of the Court, and to restrain him from receiving any more of the rent, or cutting down any more timber, without the order of the Court.

The defendant Nockholds, by his answer, denied the existence of a certain alleged arrangement set out in the bill, and claimed the same benefit as if he had demurred, and declined to give discovery to the matter mentioned in the bill previous to the year 1843; the plaintiff took exceptions to the answer, and they were allowed by the Master; the defendant excepted to the Master's report, which were argued by Romilly and Southgate, for the plaintiff; Schomberg, for the defendant.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I consider this bill is demurrable; in Adams v. Fisher, 3 Mylne and Craig, 549, the Lord Chancellor decided that where a defendant denies the plaintiff's title, he has stated on the record that which, as long as it stands, protects him from giving the plaintiff the discovery he seeks; formerly, a defendant must have answered fully, but under the orders of August, 1841, more indulgence is allowed; and under the twenty-eighth of those orders, a defendant is at liberty, by answer, to decline answering any interrogatory or part of an interrogatory, from answering which he might have protected himself by demurrer, and he shall be at liberty so to decline, notwithstanding he shall answer other parts of the bill from which he might have protected himself by demurrer. Now, supposing I was right in the construction I put upon this order, in the case of Kay v. Wall, 9 Jurist, 128, where the defendant having answered some of the interrogatories, took objection for want of parties, and claimed the same benefit of his objection, as if he had demurred, and declined to make further answer, exceptions were taken to his answer, and allowed by the Master; the defendant excepted to the Master's report, and being of opinion that the bill was demurrable, on the ground stated in the answer, I allowed the exception to the Master's report. The objection there taken was want of parties; here the defendant denies the title, upon which the plaintiff seeks the discovery, and asks the same benefit as if he had demurred, and refuses to make further answer. Being of opinion that had this objection been taken by demurrer it would have been good, I must allow these exceptions to the Master's report.

MORRISON v. MORRISON.

Practice—Contempt—Attachment—Arrest—Irregularity—Orders 26th August, 1841—Discharge—Action for arrest.

A party in contempt for disobedience of an order of the Court, made and served upon him previous to the 26th of August, 1841, cannot be arrested on the contempt until he is again served with the order indorsed in the form directed by the 12th Order of August, 1841.

Where a party in contempt is discharged from arrest, made under the order of the Court, on the ground of irregularity, the Court will exercise a jurisdiction, upon the facts of the case being fully laid before it, and will allow or restrain the party discharged from bringing an action at law for the arrest.

This suit related to a West India estate, of which a broker, named Wyllie, had been appointed receiver in the cause. In March, 1838, there was an order made directing Wyllie to pay a large sum of money he had received into court within four days of the service of the order. In May, 1839, Wyllie was duly served with the order, and neglected to perform it. He was afterwards made a bankrupt by other parties, and did not succeed in annulling the fiat in bankruptcy until October last. No proceedings were taken against Wyllie in consequence of his contempt in not obeying the order of the Court during the continuance of the fiat of bankruptcy. On the 7th of the present month he was taken into custody under an attachment for disobedience of the order of May, 1839.

Rolt now moved for his immediate discharge on the ground of irregularity, and contended that this proceeding should have been carried on under the old practice, as it existed before the orders of August, 1841, and therefore Wyllie was entitled to be served with another order to pay the money by a fixed day, or to stand committed; and that, even if supposed to be acting under the orders of August, 1841, Wyllie was entitled to receive a notice with the indorsement set forth in the 12th of those orders; therefore, in any case, this proceeding was irregular, and he was entitled to be discharged immediately from custody.

Tinney and Romilly, for the plaintiff, contended that the old practice before the orders of August, 1841, had been abolished; it was, therefore, impossible to proceed in that form, and that, with regard to the orders of August, 1841, the 12th order could only be held to apply to contempts committed after those orders were made; there was, therefore, no course left for the plaintiff to enforce this order but in the mode he had pursued, which was taken after careful consultation, and with the approval of the officers of the Court, and that to have served him with notice of the arrest would only have had the effect of giving him an opportunity of escape.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The issue of the order and the arrest of Mr. Wyllie is altogether irregular. He ought to have been served with the order directed by the general orders of August 1841, before the order for his arrest issued. I shall, therefore, discharge him from custody, but reserve the costs.

After the above decision had been made, the plaintiff asked the protection of the Court by restraining Wyllie from bringing an action against him for the imprisonment, and contended that his undertaking not to do so ought to be made a condition of his discharge, for although it was now clear that his proceeding had been irregular, yet inasmuch as it had been taken under consultation with the officers of the Court, he was entitled to the protection he asked.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I have looked into the practice of the Court on this point, and find that the Lord Chancellor would, on a proper case laid before him, assume a jurisdiction and decide whether it is proper that an action should be brought. The practice is to apply for leave to bring the action, and in one case where the party had proceeded at law without leave, the Court made him pay the costs of the action. There does not appear any reported case of the interference of the Court in a case of this sort in this country, except that of Ex parte Vansandau, in the first vol. of De Gex's Reports in Bankruptcy. There is another case decided by Sir Edward Sugden in Ireland, and reported under the name of Whistler v. Aylward, in 1 Drury's Rep. 1. That was an application to set aside an attachment which had issued against the petitioner, and under which he had been arrested, upon the ground of irregularity. The Lord Chancellor was of opinion that the execution could not be maintained, and made the following order:—"Let the petitioner, Terence Filtow, be discharged forthwith from custody under the attachment issued against him in this cause; and let the plaintiff pay the said petitioner his costs of this application when taxed; and let the Master, in taxing such costs, disallow all parts of the affidavit which do not relate to the irregularity alone of the commitment; let the petitioner be restrained from bringing an action against the parties in relation to the issuing of the said attachment, or the arrest or imprisonment thereunder." This is the only reported case in which such an order has been distinctly made; and it appears to me that the Court ought to know very clearly all the circumstances of the case before it made such an order. In the present case I do not feel that I have all the facts sufficiently before me to make the order to restrain the action; but that the Court has jurisdiction, and exercises it when it has a proper case before it, I entertain no doubt. At present, however, I shall merely make an order to discharge the arrest with costs, and shall make no order to restrain the action at law for the arrest.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

ON ERROR FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.
(Before Lord DENMAN, C.J., PATTESON, COL-LIDGE, COLTMAN, MAULE, and ERLE, JJ.)

WOODROFFE v. DOE dem. DANIEL.

Argued Feb. 6.—Decided June 18.

An estate being limited by marriage settlement to the use of R. W. and his wife, and the heirs of their bodies, and R. W. having died, leaving his widow and three children, viz. one son G. and two daughters L. and H. the widow by deed poll, bearing date September 13, 1735, in consideration of an annuity granted to her by her son and of natural affection, "granted, surrendered, and yielded up" the estate in question to the son in fee, and he afterwards during her life suffered a recovery. The widow died in 1767; G died without issue in 1779, having devised the estate to trustees to secure the payment of an annuity to W. the only son of his sister L. and subject thereto to B. the eldest son of W. for his life, with remainder to the plaintiff in error, his second son. In 1790, B. entered, on his father's death, into possession of the entirety of the estate, claiming under the will of G. In 1814 he suffered a recovery of one moiety, and in 1816 conveyed the entirety of the estate to mortgagees in fee. B. died in 1824 without issue, and on his death his brother, G. W. the plaintiff in error, entered into possession of the estates.—Held, 1. That the effect of the deed poll of 1735 was to pass a base fee to G. the son of R. W. and that this base fee did not merge, &c. in the reversion expectant on the determination of the estate tail created by the deed of settlement. 2. That the right of entry first accrued on the death of G. in 1779, and that the entry by B. in 1790 remitted him as to that moiety of the estate to which he derived a title as heir in tail under the settlement. 3. That as to the other moiety, viz. that to which H. was entitled, as co-heiress with L. after the death of G. the entry of B. did not work a remitter, and that to this moiety the plaintiff in error was entitled.

This was a writ of error from the judgment of the Court of Exchequer. The facts of the case are sufficiently stated in the judgment of this Court (infra), and will be found set forth yet more fully in the report of the proceedings in this case in the Court below. (See Doe dem. Daniel, v. Woodroffe 10 M. & W. 608.) The case was twice argued; the Court after the first argument directing that it should be re-argued with reference to this question, viz. whether, assuming that William Woodroffe was remitted as tenant in tail to the one moiety of the estate for the recovery whereof the ejectment was brought, the lessors of the plaintiff were shewn, by the special verdict, to be entitled to the other moiety. It has been thought necessary only to report very briefly the arguments, and to report them with reference to the point only which was suggested by the Court as proper to be re-argued, because both the facts and the law applicable to those facts have been stated at great length in the judgment, which has been fully reported below.

Humphry, for the plaintiff in error.—It may be conceded that the effect of the deed-poll of Hester Woodroffe, of 1735, was to pass a base fee to her son, George Woodroffe, the devisee, but inasmuch as George Woodroffe, the devisee, was heir-at-law of Robert Woodroffe, and, as such, entitled, under the settlement of 1710, to the reversion in fee expectant on the determination of the estates tail created by that deed, it is submitted, on behalf of the plaintiff in error, that the base fee so passed to George Woodroffe merged in the reversion to which he was entitled under the settlement. Then there was in this case no remitter to William Woodroffe, for William Woodroffe took his estate under the will of George Woodroffe, which took effect by virtue of the Statute of Uses, and could therefore have no other estate in the land than that which he had in the use. Besides, here William, having an interest under the devise in the will of George Woodroffe, the testator, must be considered to have elected to take under the will, and to have waived his claim to an estate tail. Lastly, it is submitted that the right of entry in William Woodroffe, as tenant in tail, was barred by the Statute of Limitations, and, consequently, that there could have been no remitter to him. Humphry argued at great length as to the effect of the different deeds mentioned in the special case, and especially of the recital in the recovery of 1814, which he contended was binding and conclusive on the lessors of the defendant in error; he cited, in the course of his argument, the following authorities:—Co. Litt. 164 a, 243 b, 267 b; Litt. s. 661; Vin. Abr. Entry. F. pl. 2, and Release N. a, pl. 3; Doe dem. Barnett v. Keen, 7 T. R. 386; Doe dem. Gill v. Pearson, 6 East. 173; Bensley v. Burdon, 2 Sim. & Stu. 519; Nash v. Turner, 1 Esp. 217; 2 Smith Lead. Cas. 2nd ed. 456; Right, on the demise of Jeffries v. Bucknell, 2 B. & Ad. 278; Cotterell v. Dutton, 4 Taunt. 826; Tolson v. Kaye, 3 Brod. & B. 217; Fearne's Opinions in his Posthumous Works, 442, 444.

Hodgson, Q. C. for the lessors of the defendant in error.—The litigation in this case has arisen from a misapprehension as to the rights of the different parties interested at the time of executing the deed-poll of 1735. The recital in that deed, that by virtue of the settlement of 1710, Hester Woodroffe was tenant for life only, and that the remainder expectant on her death belonged to her son, George, was altogether erroneous, for George Woodroffe had at that time no estate whatever in the premises. The legal effect of the deed of 1735 was not to bar the estate tail, but to create a base fee in George Woodroffe, determinable on failure of the issue of Robert and Hester Woodroffe. (Macbell v. Clarke, 1 Ld. Raym. 778.) This base fee has, however, long since been determined, for on the death of Hester Woodroffe, in 1767, she left George Woodroffe her heir in tail, and the consequence of this was, that the estate tail then became vested in him in possession, subject to the estate created by the deed of 1735. Then again the entry of one coheir is, if unexplained, an entry by all the coheirs; and inasmuch as William Woodroffe and Mrs. Walker were parceners, the entry of William Woodroffe, so as to make him tenant in tail in possession, or else his entry, together with the subsequent possession, was, as to that moiety, an actual ousting of the other coheir, and had the effect of making William Woodroffe, as to this moiety, tenant in fee-simple by wrong, so as to defeat the base fee. With respect, therefore, to that moiety of the estate which Mrs. Walker was at one time entitled to have recovered, as well as with respect to the other moiety, it is submitted that the judgment of the Court below should be affirmed.

Humphry was heard in reply, and

JUDGMENT.

PATTESON, J. now (June 18) delivered the judgment of the Court as follows:—It appears by the special verdict in this case that Mr. George Woodroffe being seised of certain lands in fee simple, by a deed which was dated January 6th, 1710, settled the same to various uses, which are long since expired, and subject thereto, to the use of Robert Woodroffe, his brother and Hester his wife, and the heirs of their bodies issuing, and in default of such issue to Robert Woodroffe in fee. Robert Woodroffe died in the lifetime of George Woodroffe, the settlor, having by his wife, Hester, one son and two daughters, Lettice Woodroffe, afterwards Billinghamurst, and Hester Woodroffe, afterwards Caverley. George Woodroffe, the settlor, died in 1713; Hester Woodroffe died in 1767, and on her death the estate tail would have descended in the regular course to her son George, and on his death, in 1779, without issue, the estate tail would have descended in moieties, namely one moiety would have descended to William Billinghamurst, the son, the only son of Lettice; on his death, in 1790, to his eldest son, William, who assumed the name of Woodroffe, and on the death of this William, in 1824, without issue, to his brother George, who also assumed the name of Woodroffe, and is the plaintiff in error. The other moiety would, in like manner, have descended, on the death of George, the nephew of the settlor, to Hester Caverley; and on her death, in 1774, to her only daughter, Ann Walker; and on her death, in 1797, to her only daughter, Jane, who married first Dalhousie Waterston, and afterwards William Mordaunt Maitland. It will be convenient in this place to advert to some of the deeds which have been executed by the parties successively in possession of the estates. In September 1735, Hester Woodroffe, being then tenant in tail, in possession, executed a deed-poll, which operated as a covenant to stand seised, the effect of which was to pass a base fee to George Woodroffe, her son, who afterwards in the same year, and in the life of Hester, suffered a recovery to the use of himself in fee. George Woodroffe, dying in 1779, by his last will devised the land in dispute to trustees and their heirs, in trust to pay an annuity of 200l. a year to his nephew, William Billinghamurst, and subject thereto to his great nephew, William Billinghamurst, afterwards Woodroffe, for life, with remainder in trust to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the first and other sons of William Billinghamurst, afterwards Woodroffe, in tail male, and in default of such issue to the use of George Woodroffe, the plaintiff in error, for life, with other limitations which are not material to be stated. The devisees in trust of George Woodroffe, the testator, entered into possession, and so continued until the death of William Billinghamurst, nephew of the testator, and until about October, 1790, when they gave possession to the great nephew, William Billinghamurst, afterwards Woodroffe, who was then of age. The said William Woodroffe, or parties claiming under him, continued in possession of the rents and profits of the entirety of the premises in question, and of other estates devised by the devisee, George Woodroffe, from the time when he came of age in October, 1790, up to the time of his death in 1824. It was agreed by the counsel on both sides, that the effect of the deed-poll of Hester Woodroffe, of 1735, was to pass a base fee to her son, George Woodroffe, the devisee, but it was contended by Mr. Humphry, for the plaintiff in error, that as George Woodroffe, the devisee, was heir-at-law of Robert Woodroffe, and as such entitled, under the settlement of 1710, to the reversion in fee expectant on the determination of the estates tail created by that deed, the base fee merged in the reversion in fee. No authority was cited in support of this proposition, but it was rested on the supposed analogy to the case where a tenant in fee levies a fine, the effect of which is to merge the estate tail and bring the reversion into possession. (Hlands on Fines; and Symonds v. Cudmore, 4 Mod. 1.) But it seems to us that the cases are not parallel, for, in the case of a fine, the estate tail is barred by force of the Statute of Fines, but in this case it is preserved by the statute de donis, and still subsists in point of right as an intermediate estate preceding the reversion in fee, and as long as that intermediate estate subsists the doctrine of merger cannot apply. But it was further contended that if the base fee were not merged in the reversion, still it would be sufficient to support the devise of George Woodroffe, the devisee, as long as it continued to exist, and it was argued that the base fee still continued to exist. It was agreed on both sides, and the law is clear, that there was no remitter to George Woodroffe, the devisee, the recovery suffered by him having effectually estopped him, and prevented him being remitted to his title under the estate tail, and it was contended by the plaintiff in error that there was no remitter to William Woodroffe on several grounds; first, on the ground that William Woodroffe took an estate by virtue of the Statute of Uses, and consequently could have no other estate in the land than what he had in the use, agreeably to the rule established in Amy Townsend's case, Plowden 111; and the dictum of Mr. Justice Patteson in Doe dem. Cooper v. Finch, 4 B. & Ad. 305, was cited. But those cases differ from the present. The estates tail in this case had been discontinued, and the issue in tail had consequently no right of entry. In the present case, the estate tail has not been discontinued, and it was upon this difference that the judgment of the Court below proceeded in conformity with the anonymous case, 3rd Leonard, 93, which was decided upon the same difference, and in conformity with Coke's Commentaries on the 693d section of Lyttleton, where the same difference is stated. The counsel for the plaintiff in error cited Vavasor's case, 2nd Leonard 222, as being inconsistent with the decision of the Court below upon this point. In that case, Nicholas Ellis being seised of the manor of Woodhall, leased it to William Vavasor and his wife, for the life of the wife, with remainder to the right heirs of the husband. The husband made a feoffment in fee to the use of himself and wife for their lives, remainder to the right heirs of the husband. The husband died, and the wife held the land, and did waste in the land. It was moved, "If the writ of waste shall suppose that the wife holdeth in ex dismissione, Nichol, Ellis, or ex dismissione vtri; and the opinion of the Court was, that the writ upon this matter ought to be general, namely, that she holds in hereditate J. S. heredis, &c. without saying ex dismissione hujus vel illius, for she is not in by the lessor nor by the feoffee, but by the Statute of Uses, and therefore the writ shall be ex hereditate, &c." It was also the opinion of the justices that the wife in that case was not remitted, but that she was in according to the form of the feoffment. This case cannot be considered as a decision on the point of remitter, there being nothing but an incidental discussion on the point in order to ascertain the opinion of the Court as to the proper form of making out the writ. If, however, the case is to be looked upon as a decision on the point, it is at variance with Hautrey's case, in 2 Dyer, 191, b, and must be considered as overruled by the subsequent case of Duncombe v. Wingfield, Hobart, 354. But, secondly, it was contended there was no remitter in this case, because the remitter was said to be subject to election, and in this case it was said that William Woodroffe had an interest, in claiming under the devise in the will of George Woodroffe, the testator, and must be considered to have elected to take under the will, and to have waived his claim to an estate tail. No authority was cited to shew that a party can waive the estate to which he would be remitted where the remitter would enure to the benefit of others as well as himself. Littlton's Treatise, section 695, is express that a disclaimer in pari is of no avail, and the reason assigned by Doddridge is stated in a note in Dyer, p. 381 b, explaining satisfactorily the ground of this rule of law. In that case, land of socage tenure was given to a husband and wife in tail, remainder to the right heirs of the husband in fee; they had issue; the husband alone levied a fine, with proclamations, which was to his own use, and then by will devised the land for life to his wife, remainder over to a stranger in fee, with a condition to pay a rent out of the land annually, with a clause of distress. He died; the wife entered, claiming only an estate for life, and she paid the rent according to the will, and then died. The question arose whether the issue in tail or remainder-man was entitled to the land. The Court held, that the issue in tail was barred, partly because the mother had waived the estate tail, and, if she had not, yet his conveyance to the title and descent of the entail, of necessity, must be made as heir of the body of his father as well as of his mother, so that the fine with proclamations levied by the father only, barred the entail. In the margin of the case there is this note: "The wife in this case had election whether she would be in of her remitter or not: because if she had been remitted, it would not have been beneficial to any other, for the fine of the husband bars the issue and all others. This reason was given by Dodderidge." We agree, therefore, with the Court below, in thinking that the disclaimer was unavailing to prevent the remitter; but it was further objected that there could be no remitter in this case to William Woodroffe on the ground that the entry was barred by the Statute of Limitations. The answer given in the Court below to this objection appears to us to be satisfactory; for we agree with that Court, that the right of entry in this case must be considered as having first accrued on the death of George Woodroffe, the testator, in 1779; for up to that time there was never any available right of entry in any person; and it could not have been the intention of the statute to take away the right of entry, unless the available right of entry descended to some person who could, as against the party in possession, have taken advantage of it. The entry, therefore, made by William Woodroffe in 1790 was within the time limited by the statute. It appears to us, therefore, that if William Woodroffe had entered into possession under a defeasible title derived under his uncle's will, having at that time a right of entry in one undivided moiety as heir in tail of that moiety, he must be considered as having been remitted to the better estate as to that moiety, and as to that moiety a good title is deduced to the lessor of the plaintiff below. But it is next to be considered what is to be the effect of the state of circumstances appearing upon the special verdict upon the other moiety of the estate to which Mrs. Walker at that time, namely, in 1790, had a claim as heir in tail. It was contended on behalf of the defendant in error that William Woodroffe and Ann Woodroffe being parceners, and William Woodroffe being remitted to his better estate, Ann Walker was remitted also. No authority was cited to shew that where a defeasible estate in land is cast on a man who has in him an elder and better title to the moiety, the remitter of him to his elder title as to one moiety operates as a remitter to the other moiety of the other parties entitled as coparceners with him. If we consider the matter independently of authority, there is no ground for holding that there is a remitter in such a case. It is said in Littleton, s. 659, that a remitter takes place where a man has two titles to land, the one a more ancient title, the other a more late title, and if he comes to the land by the later title, the law will adjudge him to be in by force of the elder title, because the elder title is a more sure and worthy title. In the present case there is no such title, Mrs. Walker having no defeasible estate cast upon her, but simply a title to an estate tail by descent. It is said, with reference to estates discontinued (Litt. s. 661), that the principal cause why the heir in such cases shall be said to be in by his remitter is for that there is not any person against whom he may sue his writ of formedon, for, as against himself, he cannot sue, and he cannot sue as against any other, for none other is tenant of the freehold. But no reason for remitter exists in the present case, since Mrs. Walker could have asserted her title to the estate tail by a simple entry without more, so that the remitter seems to fail. It might be argued that after the entry of William Woodroffe, in this case, Mrs. Walker ought to be considered as being actually in possession of her moiety, for which the case of Smales v. Dale, Hob. 120, may be cited. In that case William Watson was seized of the lands in question, and had issue, Allen and Ann Watson by one wife, and William Watson by another, and devised the lands being holden by Knight's service of the Queen (Elizabeth) to his wife during her widowhood, with remainder to William; the younger William Watson died, and his wife entered into all the lands, and that Allen made no actual entry into the lands, but died without issue, and the question was, whether the entry of the widow into the lands did work an actual entry to Allen for his third part, whereof he was tenant in common with the widow. The entry in that case was made by the widow generally, but the Court did not confine itself to what was strictly necessary to the decision of the case; for it was said, "the entry of one tenant in common might be in three manners, either in the name of herself or her fellow, or generally, which shall always be taken according to right, as being under the construction of law, and therefore ever construed lawful; or lastly, an entry claiming all expressly, which yet cannot dispossess her fellow, for her possession is over all lawful, as well before such claim as after, so that there is no possession altered by such claim, and then a sole claim, without more, can never change the possession, and without a change of possession it remains as before, and therefore a copartner, a joint tenant, or tenant in common, can never be dispossessed by his fellow but by an actual ouster." And the Court held, upon these grounds, that the entry of the widow operated as an actual entry by Allen Watson so as to exclude his brother of the half-blood. The law is laid down differently in Coke Litt. 373, b, where it is said, "Here it is to be understood that when one coparcener doth generally enter into the whole, this doth not divest the estate which descendeth by the law to the other, unless she that doth enter claimeth the whole, and taketh the profits of the whole, for that shall divest the freehold in law of the other parcener." But even supposing the position laid down in Smales v. Dale to be correct to the full extent to which it is laid down, the relation of the coparcener has been varied by the statute of the 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 27, s. 12. By that statute it is enacted "that when any one or more of several persons entitled to any land as coparceners shall have been in possession of the entirety, or more than his or their undivided share or shares of such lands for his or their own benefit, &c. &c. or for the benefit of any person or persons other than the person or persons entitled to the other share or shares of the same land or rent, such possession shall not be deemed to have been the possession of or by such last-mentioned person or persons, or any of them." This statute has been decided in the case of Culley v. Doe dem. Taylerson, 11 Ad. & E. 1016, to have relation back as far as relates to the object of the Act, and to have the effect of making their possessions separate from the time when they first became coparceners, joint tenants, or tenants in common. Since the passing of that statute the possession of land by one parcener cannot be considered as the possession of his co-parcener, nor can the entry of one have the effect of vesting the possession in the other. It remains to be considered whether William Woodroffe, by his entry and continuance of possession by which the right of entry of Mrs. Walker and her descendants was barred, is to be deemed to have gained a fee-simple by wrong to his own use. It may be admitted that, if a party enters on land by disseisin, &c. and holds it adversely to the party entitled for a sufficient length of time to bar the right, he will have gained an indefeasible estate in fee-simple by wrong to his own use, or to the use of another, for which see Littleton, s. 278, where it is said, "If two or three, &c. disseise, another of any lands or tenements to their own use, then the disseisors are joint tenants, but if they disseise another to the use of one of them, then they are not joint tenants, but he to whose use the disseisin is made is sole tenant, and the others have nothing in the tenancy, but are called condutors to the disseisin, &c." The present case is not to be likened to the case of disseisin, for William Woodroffe, when he entered as devisee under the will of George Woodroffe, entered under a title which, though defeasible, was good until defeated. The nature of the estate which George Woodroffe, the testator, possessed, and which he devised by his will, is explained in the case of Machell v. Clarke, Lord Raymond, 778, 782, where it is said, "That if tenant in tail conveys the lands entailed by bargain and sale, lease and release, or covenant to stand seised to the use of another in fee, and dies, a base fee passes by the conveyance, and the estate continues until it be avoided by the issue in tail by entry." The base fee, though defeasible, is not to be considered as a wrongful estate; and it has all the incidents of a rightful estate until it is defeated. If the issue in tail neglects to make an entry so long that his right of entry is gone, this continuance of possession by parties claiming under a base fee cannot alter the nature of the estate, but we think its effect is to bar the claim of the issue in tail, and so render the base fee indefeasible, and thereby confirm and corroborate the estates of those who, under the limitation to which the base fee is subject, are entitled to the subsequent portions of the fee, not to extinguish or vary those limitations. The result of our opinion therefore is, that as far as regards the moiety of the estate which Mrs. Walker was at one time entitled to have recovered, the base fee was never defeated; and as to that moiety the judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed, and judgment given for the plaintiff in error; but as to the other moiety, the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed.

Right to prove costs.

Costs incurred in recovering a debt may be proved under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 26, although judgment had not been signed, and the costs had not been taxed.

This was a sitting for a dividend. A creditor applied to prove, in addition to his debt, an amount of costs which he had incurred in suing for his debt. No judgment (interlocutory or final) had been signed, and the costs, though due at the time of filing the petition, had not been taxed.

The learned COMMISSIONER doubted whether, construing the Act (as the 73rd section directs) by analogy to the law of bankruptcy, he could allow the proof till judgment signed.

Cooke (amicus curiae) referred his Honour to the 26th section of statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, which, after providing that the final order shall extend to all process, &c. for nonpayment of costs, &c. proceeds thus: "And that all persons as to whose demands for any such costs, money, or expenses as aforesaid, the final order obtained by the petitioner shall be adjudged to extend shall be deemed and taken to be creditors of such petitioner in respect thereof," &c.; subject nevertheless to subsequent taxation or investigation.

HUMPHRY V. ARTHUR.

Small Debts Act.

A defendant is entitled to be discharged from custody on payment of the instalment due, and the costs of the proceedings under the Act, without also paying the costs of the judgment in the original debt.

Defendant applied to be discharged, having paid the instalment for the nonpayment of which he had been committed.

Clark, for the plaintiff, objected that defendant was not entitled to his discharge without paying also the costs of the judgment.

His HONOUR, however, decided that on payment of the instalment due, and the costs of the proceedings under the Small Debts Act, the defendant was entitled to be discharged.

Witness's expenses.

A witness is not bound to attend at the court without tender of his reasonable expenses.

In this case Mr. Kerr, a solicitor, who had been subpoenaed as a witness, refused to give evidence unless he was previously paid for his attendance.

His HONOUR said that a witness so called was to be treated as one at nisi prius, and was entitled to demand his expenses.

The solicitor to the fiat said the Taxing-Master would not allow in taxing the bill, unless it was paid under the order of Court.

His HONOUR said that was wrong, and it ought to be understood to be the right of a witness to his costs of attendance.

Where a creditor had been unable to attend to prove his debt, and therefore is not entitled to be heard in opposition at the last examination, and no other opposing creditor appears, the Court will pass the accounts, reserving permission to any creditor to question them upon the application by the bankrupt for the certificate.

The bankrupt came up on his last examination.

On behalf of one of the creditors it was stated that he had been prevented, by absence from home, from proving his debt, but that it was his intention to oppose the passing of the accounts.

No other creditor appearing, His HONOUR said, that no creditor appearing to oppose, the accounts must be passed; but he should reserve to any creditor the right of questioning the balance-sheet when the bankrupt should apply for his certificate.

Cor, for the bankrupt, then applied to his Honour to name a day for the certificate. Ordered.

Ex parte H. EMANUEL.

Circumstances under which the allowance of certificate will be suspended.

Where a partner has used the name of the firm for his private accommodation in matters foreign to the partnership, the Court will suspend the allowance of the certificate.

His HONOUR gave judgment in this case as follows:—I have now to give judgment upon the application made by Henry Emanuel for his certificate. No opposition was made by the assignees or any other person, and it was thereupon suggested by Mr. Lawrence for the bankrupt, that the Court was bound to grant the certificate as a matter of course, and it was intimated that there was no difference of opinion amongst the commissioners on this point. I thought it right to mention the subject to my brother commissioners before I finally disposed of the case. I am now authorized by my brother commissioners to state that they entirely concur in the opinion that it is the duty of the Court, on the question of the allowance of the certificate, whether opposed or not, to have regard to the conformity of the bankrupt to the laws of bankruptcy, and to his conduct as a trader, as well before as after his bankruptcy; and that, in the absence of any objection brought forward by assignees or creditors, the conformity and conduct of the bankrupt must be tested by the balance-sheet and examinations. In cases, therefore, in which the assignees express themselves satisfied with the bankrupt, and assent to the allowance of the certificate, the Court will not be astute in discovering impropriety in his conduct; but wherever fraud or gross misconduct is apparent, the bankrupt cannot be allowed to have his certificate forthwith. Now, in this case the bankrupts carried on a very extensive business as goldsmiths and jewellers, and the father and a brother had both retired with ample fortunes, and the circumstances of this case would have led one to believe that these bankrupts would have realized an independence in a few years. The misconduct of one of the bankrupts (Henry Emanuel) caused a sad reverse. He did not confine his attention to his own lucrative business, but unfortunately embarked too deeply in speculation and in accommodation, and as one false step often suggests a second more faulty, under the delusive hope of obtaining the desired end, he allowed himself to have recourse to means which must since have been to him the subject of bitter regret, involving in their consequence not only his own ruin but that of his partner and brother, as well as a great diminution in the amount of assets which might have been applicable exclusively to the payment of the bond fide partnership debts. The bankruptcy was, then, occasioned by Henry Emanuel accepting bills in the name of the firm to a very large amount (somewhat exceeding 50,000*l.*), for purposes not connected with the partnership, and this was done without the knowledge or consent of his partner. The greater portion (about 30,000*l.*) of the money raised on these bills was for the purposes of Henry Emanuel himself; and part of it, about 6,400*l.* was taken for the use of a speculation in the exportation of preserved provisions, in which Henry Emanuel was engaged with two other persons of the name of Blogg and Lyon Samuels, and the remainder (about 14,000*l.*) was a balance of liabilities incurred for the accommodation of this same Lyon Samuels. Thus the joint estate, by the act of Henry Emanuel, without his partner's knowledge or consent, is charged with the 50,000*l.* Such is the misconduct of Henry Emanuel appearing upon the face of the balance-sheet, and how is it answered? It is said, on his behalf, that the assignees believe he was the dupe and tool of others. Whatever palliation of his conduct such an excuse might afford in a poor, foolish, ignorant offender, it can have no weight in the case of one of the first traders in the city of London. Looking to the position of Henry Emanuel in the mercantile world, the Court must of necessity assume, that when he used the name of the firm for purposes foreign to the partnership, he was acting in direct contradiction to the clear evidence of his own understanding. He must have known and felt that he was committing an act of gross injustice and fraud towards his own partner, and the creditors of the partnership. The convenience of commerce may require that in certain cases one partner in trade should be able to bind another without his previous knowledge or consent, but the incalculable mischief which an abuse of this power may effect, and the facility with which a partner may create such obligations on a firm, make it imperative upon the Court, in regarding the conduct of a bankrupt, to visit severely any breach of the confidence thus unavoidably reposed in partners. Having then duly considered all the circumstances of this case, and bearing in mind the previous good conduct of the bankrupt, and the course he pursued in conjunction with his brother, for the general benefit of the creditors, as soon as he found the irrevocable ruin which he had brought upon the house, the Court does not feel called upon to refuse the certificate altogether, but "to do even law and execution right to all," the case is one which demands a long suspension. The judgment of the Court, therefore, is, that

The allowance of the certificate of the bankrupt, Henry Emanuel, be suspended for three years from the day of passing his last examination.

REG. v. NICHOLSON.

Variance.

An indictment for stealing a spade is not supported by evidence that the prisoner stole a shovel.

The indictment charged the prisoner with stealing a spade. It appeared, in evidence, that the instrument was a shovel. The prisoner was undefended, but PLATT, B. said that this was a fatal variance, and directed the prisoner to be acquitted, and a fresh indictment preferred, which was accordingly done.

REG. v. JOHNSON.

Depositions prior to committal.

It is highly improper and irregular for depositions against a prisoner to be taken in his absence, and then read over to him before they are signed. He ought to hear all the questions and answers.

In the course of the trial of this indictment, the prisoner stated that, when he was committed, his witnesses were not allowed to be present, and that none of the depositions against him were made in his presence.

PLATT, B. immediately made minute inquiries of the witnesses as to the truth of these statements. It then appeared, although not very clearly, that his witnesses were not refused admission, but that the other statement was quite true, for it was the usual practice to take the depositions of the witnesses in the absence of the magistrate and the prisoner, and when they arrived the depositions were read over to the prisoner, and he was asked if he had any questions to put, or any thing to say. His lordship, in summing up to the jury, expressed himself in very strong terms of indignation at the irregularity and extreme injustice of such a course of proceeding; and said, he trusted in future that the provisions of the law would be observed. It was most essential to fair play that any person charged should himself hear every thing that was alleged against him; for how could he collect himself to put such questions as might be necessary, when he heard, for the first time, a long beadrill of statements read over to him by the clerk? He was sorry to say that he had occasion to comment upon a similar practice upon the Oxford circuit, and the sooner it was put a stop to every where, the better.

The prisoner was acquitted.

REG. v. HAWKEY.

Murder—Cause of death.

Where a wound is inflicted under circumstances that immediate death would make the person guilty of murder; Quære, is he guilty of murder if the death ensues from an operation thought necessary, and performed by competent medical advisers, who considered that the wound was dangerous?

Semble, per Platt, B. that he is, and that, therefore, evidence is not admissible to shew that the medical men were mistaken, and that the operation was unnecessary,—and that he might not have died had the operation not been performed, or that he would not have died from the same immediate cause.

Semble, per Platt, B. that under such circumstances it is sufficient to lay the wound as the cause of death.

The prisoner was indicted as principal in a duel with Lieut. Seton, in which the latter was killed. The second, Mr. Pym, was tried and acquitted at the last spring assizes. The same points were made now as then, and Mr. Baron Platt consented to reserve them, but mainly because Mr. Justice Erie had then reserved them (see supra, 6 Law T. 500), as he expressed his own strong opinion that a party under such circumstances would be indictable for murder, and that the wound might properly be laid as the cause of death.

Rawlinson and M. Smith for the prosecution.

Cockburn, Q.C. and Kinglake, Serjt. for the defence.—In addition to the cases and arguments before used, the counsel for the prisoner cited several passages from Alison's Principles of the Scotch law, p. 145, and distinguished the cases mentioned in Russell, p. 505, as having been all the physical effects of the wound, whereas here it was admitted that the death was caused by peritoneal inflammation, consequent upon the operation, and that had he died of the wound before the operation it would have been from hemorrhage or gangrene. The prisoner was however acquitted, so that these questions may still be considered open to doubt, although the opinions of Rolfe, B. Erie, J. and Platt, B. have been given against the objections. Prisoner acquitted.

TAYLOR, Clerk, v. PYE.

Rector—Last incumbent—Liability of for dilapidations to successor—Measure of claim.

It is the duty of the incumbent to keep the parsonage-house and outbuildings in good and substantial repair, and to hand them down to his successor in the same form and condition in which they were originally erected; and that duty extends, where necessary, to restoration as well as repair.

The plaintiff was the perpetual curate of Dean, in the county of Bedford, the defendant being the executor of his predecessor; and this was an action on the case for dilapidations to the parsonage-house and outbuildings attached thereto; the claim of the plaintiff being 140*l.* The defendant paid 50*l.* into court, denying his testator's liability ultra that sum.

Fitzpatrick, with him Rodwell, having called witnesses in support of the plaintiff's case, who shewed that the buildings in question were greatly dilapidated, and that it would take 140*l.* to place them in fit and proper repair.

Byles, Serjt. with whom appeared Birch and Tesser, contra, proved that the premises were originally of a most rough and rude construction, from being built of mud and studwork, and that the sum of 50*l.* was amply sufficient to repair them, which, as the learned serjeant contended, was the limit of the last incumbent's liability, as by law established.

WILLIAMS, J. in summing up the case to the jury, left it to them to say whether the sum of 50*l.* was sufficient to comply with the requisites of the law, which imposed on all incumbents the duty of keeping the parsonage-house assigned to the cure as a residence, and all the outbuildings, in good and substantial repair; and also to preserve them and hand them down to his successor in the same form and condition in which they had been originally built. This was an obligation larger than that contended for by the defendant, but such was undoubtedly the law. Each incumbent had a right to receive the buildings assigned as his residence in their original states, and if such dilapidations should exist as would render over their restoration necessary, the law laid the liability of rebuilding on the predecessor or his legal representative. The question now raised, therefore, was, whether in that rule of the law the sum of 50*l.* was sufficient; and on that question the jury would decide from the evidence before them.

Verdict for the defendant.

LINCOLN SUMMER ASSIZES, 1865.

(Before Mr. Justice PATTERSON.)

SMITH v. NEWCOMB.

Recovery of deposits.

The principle of the case of Walstab v. Spottiswoode does not extend to cases where there is no evidence of the abandonment of the scheme by the committee. The project must have come to a conclusion before an action will lie to recover back the deposits.

This was an action to recover from the defendant, who was a provisional committeeman of the Nottingham and Peterborough Junction Railway, the amount of the deposit paid upon 35 shares which had been allotted to the defendant.

Whitcomb, Q.C. and Willmore, for the plaintiff.

Humfrey, Q.C. and Waddington, for the defendant.

The plaintiff's right to recover was sought to be maintained upon the grounds stated in an authority of the celebrated case of Walstab v. Spottiswoode. The circumstances of the present case will be clearly gathered by the evidence of Mr. H. Gridley, one of the solicitors to the line.

That gentleman deposed that the scheme was projected in September last. There were to be 27,500 shares, of 20*l.* each, issued, and the deposit thereon was to be 2*l.* 2s. A large provisional committee was formed, and the defendant's name was on the list, but he had never acted, and never applied for any shares. No application was made to Parliament for a Bill, though all the plans had been duly deposited, the traffic tables taken, and the other necessary arrangements put in a state of forwardness. The reason for not applying to Parliament was the deficiency of money, arising from the allottees not having paid their deposits. The number of shares originally intended to be assigned to the public were all allotted. The managing directors, as such, had none appropriated to them; but the provisional committee were to have 9,000, which was afterwards reduced to 6,000, in consequence of the number of applications from the public. The directors did not take up any shares; but when it was found that the allottees did not pay, and that heavy expenses had been incurred, they came forward and paid the deposits on the number that was originally to have been assigned to them. When it was found that the company had not the funds to go to Parliament, the following circular was issued by the secretary:—

"I am directed by the directors to inform you, that in consequence of the nonpayment of the deposits on a great number of the shares allotted, this project cannot be proceeded with in the present season. The directors have at great expense surveyed the whole line, taken the traffic, &c. and much regret the failure, at least for a time, of a scheme, likely to be profitable in itself, and fraught with great benefit to the country. They hope you will not hesitate to pay the amount of 3*l.* per share on the shares so lotted to you, towards the expenses; and when this is done a meeting of the shareholders will be called to determine what course shall be pursued in future."

About 2,000*l.* had been paid in deposits by the directors. The defendant never applied for shares, but he had paid 210*l.* towards the expenses. Although the number of shares to be issued was only 27,500, up to the 14th of October more than 400,000 shares had been applied for. After that date several applications were received, but none were opened, it being impossible to attend to them. The plaintiff applied for 66 shares, but only 36 were allotted to him. The directors had not now abandoned their intention of going to Parliament; they would have gone this session if the money had been paid up by the allottees. Only 8,000*l.* had been hitherto paid by the public, and between 10,000*l.* and 11,000*l.* by provisional committee men and directors.

Hewitson submitted that no case had been proved, and that the plaintiff must be nonsuited. This was an action for money had and received, and could only be maintained on the ground that the consideration on which it was paid had altogether failed. It was quite clear that there was no evidence on which the plaintiff was entitled to recover back his money. Among all the cases that had been tried arising out of railway matters, there was not one like the present. That of Walstab v. Spottiswoode was quite different: there the plaintiff, who had subscribed money on the faith of receiving scrip, was told, on an application to change the banker's receipt for scrip, that none would be issued: in addition, there were to be 80,000 shares divided, but the committee allotted only 70,000; and when the plaintiff in that case sought an explanation, she was told by one of the provisional committee that the concerns of the committee would be wound up, and the surplus divided. It was consequently held that the scheme having proved abortive, the allottee was entitled to recover her deposit. Here all the shares were allotted; and it was only because the allottees had failed to pay their deposits, that the project had for a time stopped. The committee had contracted to do their utmost to render the scheme successful; and they had left undone nothing that it was their duty to do. He therefore submitted that, as this was a case in which the plaintiff could not say the consideration had wholly failed, he must be nonsuited.

Waddington, on the same side.—The striking fact in this case was, that every single share to be allotted was allotted; and every thing was ready to go to Parliament and to carry out the project, as soon as the allottees furnished the means. The company was not now defunct, but was waiting to see what could be done best for the interests of all concerned in it. There was no rescinding or breaking of the original contract, as in the Spottiswoode case; but the scrip was issued, and the shareholders (the plaintiff among the number) had opportunities of disposing of their purchases even at a premium.

Whitehurst and Willmore relied upon the doctrine laid down in Walstab v. Spottiswoode, and Nockells v. Crooby. The contract in the cases referred to was held to be abortive, because all the conditions originally set forth had not been complied with. It was not at all necessary to substantiate the claim of the plaintiff in this case to prove that the project was at an end. Whether the company intended to apply to Parliament or not was perfectly immaterial; they had promised to apply for a Bill during the present session; and, having neglected to do that, they had to all intents and purposes broken the contract. Precisely the same question had been raised in the Court of Exchequer, and the Chief Baron there held that it was not necessary to prove the dissolution of a company to entitle a party to recover, because if they could ward off an action by postponing the dissolution, they never would dissolve. When the parties to this project purchased their scrip, they did so on the faith of the prospectus, which promised an application to Parliament this session, and if that application was not made, there was an end of the scheme as originally propounded.

FATTESON, J.—I must say I think the action is premature; but I will not say that it should not go to the jury. I think that in the case of Walstab v. Spottiswoode, the scheme was most decidedly abandoned and at an end; but I do not think it can be said that the contract on the part of the present defendant should be confined to the existing session. There was something in the prospectus to the effect that the projectors would go with confidence to Parliament in the (then) ensuing session; but what they meant was, that the scheme was so likely to obtain the sanction of influential parties, that they would go to Parliament with a confidence that their measure would pass, supposing they complied with the standing orders. This seems to me altogether a different case from Walstab v. Spottiswoode, because there the shares were not all allotted, and the allottee was told, when application was made for scrip, that none would be issued, and that the scheme was abandoned. Here, on the contrary, all the shares were taken, and even the provisional committee gave up a portion of the number assigned to them. They made all preparations to go to Parliament, and were only stopped from doing so because the deposits were not paid. I think this action is premature, and that the plaintiff has no right to bring it till the project has come to a conclusion. I shall put the case to the jury, as Mr. Whitehurst seems to require it; but I shall let them know my opinion, that there is no evidence to sustain the action.

Whitehurst said, that after the strong observations of his lordship on the case, he felt it would be ungracious to go to the jury, and should therefore submit to be nonsuited.

THE LEGISLATOR.

Summary.

THE small measure of Mr. HUME for grappling with the giant abuses of Charitable Trusts by requiring an annual account to be laid before Parliament has been met with as loud an outcry against it from the speculators as was raised against the larger measure of Lord LYNDHURST, and with equal success. The Bill has been withdrawn; but only on an express pledge from ministers that the entire subject shall be entertained next Session. Of the Conveyancing Bill and other crudities we hear nothing.

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.

TITHE COMMUTATION.—Wednesday the Parliamentary returns presented by the Tithe Commissioners were printed, of all agreements and of all awards for the commutation of tithes confirmed by them, as also of all apportionments confirmed from the 1st of July, 1845, to the 1st of January, 1846. The first branch of the return has reference to the agreements confirmed by the commissioners in the half-year mentioned, shewing the amount of rent-charges agreed to be paid in lieu of tithes. By the summary it appears that the compositions and rates amounted to 6,545*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*; rent-charges, 7,143*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.*; increase of rent-charges, 604*l.* 10*s.* 0*d.*; decrease of rent-charges, 51*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.*; rent-charges for which compositions cannot be ascertained, 656*l.* 16*s.* 5*d.*; rent-charges of the present return, 7,800*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.*; rent-charges of former returns, 2,454,338*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.*; total rent-charges, 2,462,139*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.*. The result shews that the total increase in the present return is 598*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.*, and in the former returns 56,542*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.*, making the total increase 57,140*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.*. The second branch contains a return of all awards for the commutation of tithes which have been confirmed in the period specified, specifying the amount of rent-charge awarded to be paid in lieu of tithes, and shewing whether the same be payable to appropriators, improprators, or clerical incumbents. The total rent-charges of this part amount to 61,196*l.* 0*s.* 11*d.*; and of former returns, 1,088,282*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.*, making the total rent-charges 1,149,478*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.*. The third part shews the apportionments confirmed by the Tithe Commissioners in the six months from July to January. The document extends to twenty-two pages.

RAILWAY BILLS.—By a Parliamentary paper procured by Sir G. Grey a return is made of all railway bills which have been reported to the House of Commons during the present session, with a tabular statement of the maximum rates of charges and fares for goods and passengers respectively authorized by such bills. The document contains 138 bills, made up to the 29th of May. From an examination it appears that in the first class the highest sum per mile to be charged for passengers is to be 3*d.*, and the lowest in the same class 2*d.*, whilst in the third class the charge is to be 1*d.* and 1*d.*. In the second class the charge in some instances is to be 1*d.*, and in others 2*d.*, a mile. On some of the railways, when the speed is more than 25 miles per hour, an additional 4*d.* is allowed in the first class. The charges in some of the bills reported during the present session are to have reference to former acts. In the Great Western Bill no provision has been made with regard to charges of any description.

COUNTY RATES.—Bill authorizes justices to disallow rates in cases where there is reason to believe that a proper valuation of the parish has not been made. Overseers or other officers compellable to furnish copy of rate within fourteen days after application, under penalty, not exceeding 20*l.* Where new valuation made, poor-law commissioners to supply copy of same to clerk of the peace. A fresh assessment to be made every seven years.

BRITISH MUSEUM AND NATIONAL GALLERY.—The return states that, with the view of giving effect to the recommendations of the select committee on public monuments, the trustees of the British Museum have permitted artists and private parties of visitors, upon application to any of the officers of the establishment, to study and view the collections every Saturday after two o'clock. This regulation took effect in July, 1842. Since June, 1843, the synopsis of the Museum has been divided into six parts, which are sold separately, at prices varying from one penny to three-pence each. The trustees of the National Gallery have made improvements in the ventilation of that building. The price of the authorized catalogues has been reduced from 1s. to 4d., and other catalogues are permitted to be sold in the portico at 1d. Facilities have been granted for the reception of pictures and other works of art, intended to be subsequently transferred as donations to the use of other museums throughout the kingdom; and twenty additional artists belonging to the Royal Academy, have been admitted to paint in the gallery on the days set apart for study.

PUBLIC PETITIONS.—The report contains a classified statement of the number of petitions (with the aggregate of signatures attached under each particular head) presented to Parliament during the present session. The principal are the following:—For the release of Mr. Smith O'Brien, thirty-six petitions, 72,056 signatures; for the better observance of the Lord's Day, 170 petitions, 38,602 signatures; for the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, 123 petitions, 33,825 signatures; against the Repeal of the Corn-laws, 1,958 petitions, 145,855 signatures; for the repeal, 466 petitions, 1,412,613 signatures; against the Customs and Corn Importation Act, 863 petitions, 53,046 signatures; for the measure, 102 petitions, 69,488 signatures; for substituting arbitration for war, eighteen petitions, 24,947 signatures.

Bills in Progress.

LAND COMPANIES CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION.—A Bill is now before the House of Commons, which, under the title of "Land and Companies Clauses Consolidation," offers further facilities by which the winding-up of railway companies may be brought about in cases where they either ought not to go on, or it is desired by the shareholders to suspend proceedings. This Bill, which comes into operation immediately on passing, requires that when a company has obtained an Act of Parliament, the whole of the capital required for defraying expenses shall be subscribed under contract within two calendar months after the passing of such Act; that within three months after the passing of such Act the register of shareholders shall be completed; and that within four months a copy of the register shall be deposited with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies. It is further provided that within three months after depositing the copy register, a majority in value of the registered shareholders may dissolve the company. This Bill has given very great satisfaction to some of the more practical men in the city, who see in it a remedy for the deficiencies of former proceedings on the part of the Legislature.

POOR REMOVAL.—The Bill to consolidate and amend the laws relating to the removal of the poor, as amended by the committee, was printed on Saturday. It now contains only ten clauses, and was further considered on Monday in the House of Commons. It is proposed to add a new title on the third reading, calling it, "An Act to amend the Laws relating to the Removal of the Poor." The substance of the measure may be concisely stated:—Persons, after the passing of the Act, who have resided five years in a parish, are to be exempted from the liability to be removed. There are exceptions in cases of prisoners and others. Widows, during their widowhood, shall not be removed for twelve months next after the death of their husbands. Children, whether legitimate or illegitimate, under the age of sixteen, residing with their parents, are not to be removed from a parish from which their parents may not lawfully be removed, nor are sick persons to be removed unless it shall be certified that the sickness will produce permanent disability. A settlement is not to be gained by an exception to be removed. A penalty is provided for procuring the removal of poor persons out of a parish without the warrant of justices. The delivery of paupers at a workhouse or union is to be considered a good delivery. The Poor Law Amendment Act, which is to be construed as one with the present Act, which Act is only to extend to England, and may be amended or repealed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

RELIGIOUS DISABILITIES BILL.

THURSDAY, July 23.—Lord LYNDHURST begged to call their lordships' attention to a bill which had been some time before them—the Religious Disabilities Bill. This bill had passed through committee, and an understanding had been come to that a communication should take place between him and the right rev. prelate (the Bishop of London), with a view of considering certain amendments proposed by the right rev. prelate. He had had an opportunity of meeting the right rev. prelate, and they had agreed upon two amendments; and what he now proposed was, that their lordships should go into committee pro forma for the purpose of committing those amendments, together with one or two other amendments. There was an understanding that her Majesty's Government were disposed to make this a Government question, and if he went on with this measure, it was on this distinct understanding. He hoped their lordships would allow him to go into committee pro forma.—The Marquis of LANSDOWNE was extremely glad that the noble and learned lord had been induced to go on with the bill, and he had no objection to state, on the part of the Government with which he had the honour to be connected, that they would consider it a Government measure so far as being determined to give to its passing every facility in their power to afford.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

DEATH BY ACCIDENTS COMPENSATION.

WEDNESDAY, July 22.—Mr. BOUVIER moved that the House should go into committee on the Bill for providing compensation in case of death by accidents. This, in connection with the Deodands' Abolition Bill, which stood for second reading, raised an interesting discussion. It was generally admitted that the law on this subject was in a very imperfect state, and required careful revision; and amongst other speakers, Mr. WAKLEY detailed the particulars connected with a well-known accident on the London and Birmingham Railway, in which the jury had awarded a deodand of 2,000l. In that case he had, as coroner, taken the greatest pains to have the verdict properly drawn up, and had acted on the advice of the present Attorney-General and other eminent legal authorities. Yet, notwithstanding the minute and anxious pains he had taken to have the verdict framed so as to render it impervious to all technical objection, it had been carried into the Court of Queen's Bench, and it was there quashed.—Sir GEORGE GREY advised Mr. Bouvier to adopt the suggestion which had been thrown out, of referring the Bill to a select committee, to which the Deodands' Abolition Bill might also be referred.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM thought that, as Lord Campbell had taken a great interest in the subject, the two Bills might be postponed until the Government came to a determination as to whether or not they would not refer them to the criminal law commissioners. It was true that the subject did not belong to the criminal law, but it was germane to it, and it could not be brought under the consideration of two more competent or able persons than Mr. Sturges and Mr. Amos, who were members of that commission. At that period of the session it was not likely that the Bills, in their present shape, could be brought to a successful termination.—The ATTORNEY-GENERAL admitted that the law should be carefully revised; but as it was desirable that deodands should be made the medium of affording compensation to the family of a person killed, the law, not merely of England, but of Scotland, should be taken into consideration. The criminal law commissioners were Sir E. Ryan, Mr. Bellenden Ker, Mr. Sturges, and Mr. Amos; and, therefore, if the subject were referred to them, some gentlemen practically acquainted with the law of Scotland should be joined with them.—Lord GRANVILLE SOMERSET thought that in any alteration of the law of deodand manorial rights should be taken into consideration. The two Bills were then postponed till Monday.

CHARITABLE TRUSTS BILL.

On the motion that the House go into committee on the Charitable Trusts Bill, Sir GEORGE GREY suggested to the honourable member for Montrose the propriety of withdrawing the bill. Last week the House affirmed by the second reading the principle of the measure, which principle was the accountability of persons holding charitable trusts to Parliament, through the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Since the second reading he had received a great number of communications from persons interested in the matter, not offering any objection to the principle of the accountability (on the contrary, they fully approved of it), but urging additions that had not been contemplated by the honourable member for Montrose, and making various suggestions of great weight and importance, which demanded and ought to receive the most serious consideration. (Hear, hear.) The Government desire to devote their best attention to the matter, and his noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor would soon have under his consideration another measure, affirming the principle of the Bill introduced by the honourable member for Montrose, but more general in its import, and much more comprehensive in its details. (Hear, hear.) The principle of the Bill at present under consideration having been deliberately recognised by the House, he trusted that his honourable friend the member for Montrose, taking into consideration the lateness of the session and all the other circumstances of the case, would be induced to withdraw the Bill for the present, or at least postpone it on the understanding that a measure similar in object, but more comprehensive in detail, would be brought forward by Government at an early period next session.—Mr. HUMPHREYS signified his willingness to comply with the suggestion. Since last week he had received several communications on the subject of the Bill, all showing the necessity of the measure, but all requiring more to be done than he had contemplated. The only object that he had been desirous of effecting was, that a balance-sheet, shewing the revenue and expenditure on account of these charitable trusts, should be laid before Parliament, thereby affording to that House and the public generally the means of obtaining that information for which they had for many years looked in vain. If Government would pledge itself to introduce next session a comprehensive enactment of this description, he would willingly accede to the suggestion of the right honourable baronet. It did not surprise him that a Bill of this description should have encountered very great opposition, for never had a Bill been introduced respecting the charitable trusts in this country that was not sure to encounter the fiercest resistance from interested parties, who could not endure the thoughts of letting the daylight in on their proceedings.—Mr. ESCOTT hoped that the Government would redeem their pledge by taking this matter into their consideration on their earliest possible convenience. If proof were required of the absolute necessity for some such measure as that introduced by the honourable member for Montrose, it was to be found in the extraordinary terror and consternation which the Bill had already produced in the minds of persons connected with charitable trusts.—Mr. BROTHERTON was inclined to think that some such simple enactment as that of the honourable member for Montrose would have been found quite adequate for the accomplishment of every desirable object.—Mr. STUART had objected to the Bill, not because he was hostile to its principle, but because he thought that a measure of the kind should have been brought forward at a time of year and under circumstances which could secure for it that degree of attention which, in his opinion, the importance of the subject demanded. The Bill of the honourable member for Montrose would not supply an adequate remedy for the evils complained of. The only proper remedy for the present faulty system was to establish a speedy, easy, and, as far as possible, an unexpensive tribunal for redressing abuses in cases of charitable trusts. He must say, however, that he could not approve of the Bill of the honourable member for Montrose, for he believed that it was open to a great constitutional objection. Any measure brought in on this subject ought, moreover, to be a Government measure.

THE MAGISTRATE.

SUMMARY.

No topic of interest has engaged public attention during the past week. The Summary of Magistrates' Cases during the two last Terms is continued in the present number.

REVIEW OF MAGISTRATES' CASES,

CHARGEABILITY.

Certificate under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101.—Two very refined objections, both of which were disposed of summarily by the Court, were raised in Reg. v. High Bickington, 7 Law T. 83; 1 New Mag. Cas. 329; upon an order of removal as to the same paupers, who were attempted to be removed in the famous High Bickington case. The only evidence of chargeability was a certificate under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, which was in the usual form, and the copy sent to the appellants had the following note appended to it:—

This certificate was received in evidence by us, two of her Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Devon, and acting therein, the 13th day of September, 1844.

JOHN DASH.
JAMES WESTON.

There were two objections made to the sufficiency of this evidence of chargeability: first, that the identity of the paupers removed and those named in the certificate was not shown; and second, that it did not appear that the certificate was produced to the removing justices. The Court, however, overruled both objections, and held the evidence of chargeability to be sufficient. (See Reg. v. Ashburton, supra, 84, 303.)

Reg. v. Bradford, 7 Law T. 156; 1 New Mag. Cas. 522; 1 New Sess. Cas. 330, is one of those unsatisfactory cases that sometimes occur, when it is impossible to state with accuracy the grounds of the decision. The examinations contained the following evidence of chargeability. Joseph Applegate said:—

I am a relieving-officer acting under the board of guardians of the Westbury and Wootton Bassett Union, and for the district of the said union in which the township of Steeple Ashton is situated. I know Thomas Barrett and Ann his wife, the paupers. I have paid them parish relief in money for upwards of a year now last past, during which time I have paid them half-a-crown weekly, and every week, on account of the said township of Steeple Ashton, to which township they still continue chargeable; and I still pay them the same sum weekly on account of the said township of Steeple Ashton, out of the money in my hands belonging to the said township.

The pauper also stated, that "some time ago, being unable to work, I was obliged to apply to the parish officers of the township of S. for parish relief, and so became chargeable to the said township, and have continued chargeable to the said township ever since; and I receive weekly from J. A., the relieving officer of the district. I and my wife are still subsisting on the relief we received from him, the said J. A., on account of the said township." Under the ground of appeal, that there was no evidence of chargeability, it was objected, that it was not shewn that the pauper was in the parish when relief was given, and also, that it was not shewn that he, the relieving officer, relieved him as being chargeable to the parish, he being a relieving officer of the district.

Although present at the argument, we feel somewhat doubtful upon what ground the Court decided. Our own impression, in which also a very accurate friend concurred (see Justice of the Peace, May 9), was, that the omission to state that the pauper was in the parish when relieved was the ground of the decision, but it is right to state that some at least of the counsel engaged in the case took a different view. When decisions of this kind are given, we can only, with all submission, use the metaphor, aliquando dormitat Homerus. A similar point as to the relieving officer was decided in Reg. v. Shillington (6 Law T. 147.) The converse of the other objection, founded upon the same argument, that relief itself may be evidence of chargeability, as a settlement, was made in Reg. v. Chatham (7 Law T. 11; 1 New Mag. Cas. 518.) The examinations in support of an order of removal to the parish of Chatham, in the county of Kent, stated relief given by the parish of Chatham to the pauper whilst residing at Gillingham, in the same county; and it was objected that it did not appear that Gillingham was a separate parish, or that it was not in the parish of Chatham. And then the inference sought to be drawn of a settlement from the fact of relief would fail, as, whether settled or not, relief must be given to the poor in the parish. It was held, however, to be unnecessary to state that Gillingham was a separate parish, and that relief out of the parish of Chatham was shewn.

COMMISSIONERS OF TAXES.—CONVICTION.

Summons by one commissioner. 3 Geo. 4, c. 23, s. 2.—In Jones v. Gurdon, 2 Q. B. 600, the construction of 52 Geo. 3, c. 93, sched. L, rule 13, in connection with 3 Geo. 4, c. 23, s. 2, was considered with reference to the power of one justice and Commissioner of Taxes to hear and determine upon a complaint where another justice and commissioner issued the summons in respect of an offence against the Stamp Act. It was held that the 13th rule did not authorize any justice to hear the matter except the one to whom the information or complaint is made, and that the 3 Geo. 4 makes no difference, because it does not contain any enactment that one justice may summon and another hear, but only recognizes such a course of proceeding incidentally, which is quite legal where no provision to the contrary is made. In Reg. v. Griffin, 7 Law T. 225, upon the same principle, it was decided that one commissioner, not being a justice, cannot receive an information and issue a summons under the former Act, or under the latter. Not under the former, because the words are to be construed redenda singula singulis, that two commissioners must summon before them, or one justice before him, and not under the latter, because that only applies where no provision to the contrary is made.

COPIES OF EXAMINATIONS.

Stamp.—An ingenious objection was made in Reg. v. Keighley (7 Law T. 168; 1 New Mag. Cas. 527; 1 New Sess. Cas. 381), to the copy of a deed sent as part of the examinations under the 79th section of the Poor Law Act as imperfect, because the amount of the stamp was not stated, nor any description of it given. The Court were somewhat inclined to yield to it, but decided that it was unnecessary, because in fact the stamp is no part of the deed or document to which it is affixed. It is rendered necessary to make it admissible in evidence, but the contents of a lost deed may be proved without any evidence that it was stamped.

If the parish to which the pauper is ultimately removed attend at the time of making the order, and offer evidence against the order being made, the justices are not bound to take such evidence down in writing, or to send any note or copy of it, with the examinations, after the order is made. This was decided in Reg. v. The Inhabitants of Holme (7 Law T. 204; 1 New Mag. Cas. 544.)

In giving judgment, PATTISON, J. said, "I by no means say that the justices have any discretion as to whether they will take down and send evidence offered by the removing parish; but in this case the evidence which they do not send was offered by the appellant parish, and the order was made notwithstanding it."

COSTS.

Frivolous objections.—Reg. v. Justices of Surrey (7 Law T. 204; 1 New Mag. Cas. 526) will, we hope, tend greatly to discourage the litigation of frivolous objections; although the ingenuity of counsel may have succeeded in persuading the justices at sessions to allow the objection. The objection had been made, and successfully, that a notice of appeal commencing "We, being a majority of, and acting for and on behalf of the churchwardens and overseers," was insufficient, and the parish officers opposed the rule for a mandamus, directing the Sessions to enter continuances and hear. The mandamus issued, and the appeal subsequently tried, and the order of removal quashed. The appellant parish then applied to the Court to compel the respondents to pay the costs occasioned by the mandamus. The Court, admitting the general rule that costs incurred by the mistake of a judge or Court are not usually indicted upon the party who endeavours to support that decision, asserted their right to give or withhold costs of motions, according to circumstances, and to mark their sense of the frivolousness of the original objection, and the impropriety of persisting in the endeavour to retain the temporary advantage gained at the sessions.

ESTATE SETTLEMENT.

Distance, how measured.—The construction of the 68th section of 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 76, has at length been settled in Reg. v. Saffron Walden (7 Law T. 264; 2 New Sess. Cas. 360.) That section is, "that no person shall be deemed, adjudged, or taken to retain any settlement gained by virtue of any possession of any estate, or interest in any parish, for any longer or further time than such person shall inhabit, within ten miles thereof." It is manifest that the word "thereof" is ambiguous. The question arose upon the following facts:—It was found by the Sessions that from the boundary of the parish of Furneux Pelham to the house which the pauper was inhabiting in Saffron Walden, the distance was ten miles and a quarter by the nearest mode of access; but, measured in a straight line on a horizontal plane from such boundary to such house, the distance was but nine miles. From the boundary of the estate and lands above-mentioned in the parish of Furneux Pelham to the house inhabited by the pauper in Saffron Walden, the distance was more than ten miles by the nearest mode of access; but, measured in a straight line, the distance was but nine miles; and from the boundary of the parish of Furneux Pelham to the boundary of the parish of Saffron Walden, the distance by either of the above modes of measurement was less than ten miles. The Sessions quashed the order of removal, considering that the measurement must be by a horizontal line from the residence of the pauper to the boundary of the parish in which his estate lay, and not by the nearest means of access, or by the distance between the boundaries of the respective parishes. In the discussion a statute was referred to on each side, as a statutory mode of measurement; but the Court held that an arbitrary rule must be laid down, and decided that the mode should be as adopted by the Sessions, and as was suggested by Parke, B. in Leigh v. Hind (9 B. & C. 774), viz. as the crow flies, or a horizontal line between the residence and the boundary of the parish where the estate is. The order of Session was accordingly confirmed.

HIRING AND SERVICE SETTLEMENT.

Exceptional hiring.—An exceptional hiring is one whereby, during some period of the time for which the contract is made, the servant is not bound to serve the master. Clear as this principle is, conflicting interests of parishes raise disputes as to its application. Each case must depend upon the words and plain intent of the parties; it will suffice, therefore, merely to mention two decisions in last Term. In the first (Reg. v. North Howran, 7 Law T. 183), an agreement by which A and B, owners of silk mills, hire C and D, for three years, to dress silk, with a stipulation that they should be paid so much a pound for the first three months, and after that, so much a pound, provided they did a certain quantity each week, and proportionately more, if more was done, but with deductions for less than that quantity, was held not to be an exceptional hiring. In Reg. v. Walbottle (7 Law T. 254), the Court decided that there was an exceptional hiring under a pit bond. The material provisions of the bond were, that the pauper was hired for a year to work in a pit; that he should on every working day, including pay Saturdays, do a full day's work, or such a quantity of work as should be deemed so; that the master should find as much work as would enable him to earn 28s. in a fortnight, under a penalty of 2s. 6d.; except for fourteen days at Christmas, during which he might lay the pits off work; but that during ten days at Christmas, and other days when the pits should be off work, the pauper should continue in the service, although not at work. The explanation of the decision is thus given by Lord Denman:—R. v. Gateshead must decide this case, unless the words of the 6th clause are general enough to make the pauper a servant of the employer during the whole time over which the hiring extends. They are calculated to create that impression in the first instance, but upon examination it is clear that they do not refer to the ordinary working days. That being so, there is such a limitation of the hours of work as in R. v. Gateshead was held to constitute an exceptional hiring.

CONSECUTIVE IMPRISONMENTS.

MANY questions of importance having lately arisen as to the power of magistrates in cases of summary jurisdiction to inflict consecutive imprisonments for offences adjudicated upon on one and the same day, Mr. HALL, the magistrate of Bow-street, has taken the opinion of the late Attorney and Solicitor-General upon the point, and which was laid before the magistrates of Middlesex at the last Quarter Sessions. The following were the questions submitted:—

"1st. If two or more charges, punishable in a summary manner, be heard before a magistrate on the same day, and he convicts in both cases, can he lawfully issue one warrant only in the first instance, and commit the defendant to prison in respect of one of the offences, and when the imprisonment is about to terminate issue a second warrant in respect of the other offence, directing the gaoler to detain the defendant for a further period of imprisonment?—2nd. Whether, in hearing two cases on the same day, the magistrate who convicts in both can order in his warrant of commitment that the defendant should be imprisoned in respect of one of the offences for a stated time, and that at the end of such time he should be imprisoned for the second offence for a further period?—3rd. If a defendant be charged before a magistrate on the same day by two complainants with having committed distinct assaults on each of them at different times, namely, one on that day, and another on the preceding day, can the magistrate lawfully adjudicate upon one only of such charges, and suspend the hearing of the other until the imprisonment in the case heard shall have expired, and then, on summoning the defendant to appear, proceed to hear and adjudicate upon the other charge?"

And the following was the

"1st and 2nd.—We are of opinion, that where a magistrate has summary jurisdiction, he ought not upon convictions in several cases, to defer sentence in the second, until the imprisonment upon the first is about to expire, and then issue a warrant of detention for a second period of imprisonment. The proceeding of the magistrate in the present case was, therefore, erroneous; and we are of opinion, that if two or more charges be brought before a magistrate at the same time, it is his duty to adjudicate upon them in succession, and without delay. If he convict upon more than one, where the punishment is imprisonment, he should make out separate warrants upon each conviction, the second imprisonment to commence and take effect upon the expiration of the first.—3rd. The same rule applies to a case of two or more charges of assault. The proper course (and which is adopted by the superior courts), is that which is above pointed out in answer to the 1st and 2nd questions."

JUVENILE OFFENDERS.—The following is the report of the committee of the Middlesex magistrates appointed the last county day, to prepare suggestions for checking the growth of juvenile crime, and promoting the reformation of juvenile offenders:—

"The committee have held several meetings, and have given to the subject their most serious consideration. They have been favoured with the printed and written suggestions of several Middlesex justices on the matter, and have agreed to the following resolutions on the first part of the subject referred to them—namely, the best means of checking the growth of juvenile crime:—

"1. That the fearful extent of juvenile depravity and crime in the metropolitan districts, and in large and populous towns generally, requires immediate interference on the part of the legislature.

"2. That a very long and painful experience has clearly shown that the great causes of this juvenile depravity and crime are the want of proper parental or friendly care, and the absence of a comfortable or a suitable home, and the consequent neglect of religious and moral training.

"3. That destitute and neglected children, of which there are great numbers, whose cases cannot effectually be dealt with under the provisions of the Poor-law, and who are suffering from either of the before-mentioned causes, require protection to prevent their getting into bad company, learning idle or dissolute habits, growing up in ignorance, and becoming a heavy and expensive burthen on the country as criminals.

"4. That it appears to this committee that the protection and instruction required for such children should be afforded by the state equally as a matter of economy and humanity.

"5. That for want of such protection and religious and moral training, it is from the ranks of these very children in after-life that the band of felons is principally recruited; and to deal properly with them at a moderate expense during their childhood, would prevent their becoming subjects for the far more expensive and difficult arrangement of transportation as adults.

"6. That this committee, in conclusion, recommends that a memorial be presented from the Court of Quarter Sessions of the county of Middlesex to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, praying that the government will forthwith originate some measure founded on the views embraced by the foregoing resolutions for the prevention of juvenile depravity in the county of Middlesex.

"The committee have not yet entered into the consideration of the subject of the reformation of juvenile offenders, but they will proceed in their inquiries, and report the result to the Court on some future county day. (Signed)

"HENRY POWNALL, Chairman.

"Sessions House, July 23, 1846."

SEPARATE CONFINEMENT FOR YOUNG OFFENDERS.—At the last Dorset Quarter Sessions, the proposition of the Marquis of Westminster for the separate confinement of juvenile prisoners again came under the consideration of the Court. The visiting justices of the gaol and house of correction had been instructed to inquire into the capabilities of the prison for such a purpose, and a special report from them was read. They reported,—1. That the gaol in its present state does not admit of the adoption of the separate system. 2. That no alteration in the existing building will effect the purpose. 3. That a limited number of prisoners (not exceeding 36) might be contained in a building to be erected between the south-eastern and south-western wings as standing at present. 4. That by the removal of the south-eastern and south-western wings two buildings may be erected to contain a further number of 54 prisoners on the separate system in each wing. The building for containing 36 prisoners was estimated to cost 4,000*l.* but "it appeared to the committee that, unless the separation was extended, a great many of the new cells would be ill-ventilated and badly lighted," and they, therefore, did not recommend the adoption of this plan. It also appeared that great inconveniences would arise from the construction of the buildings to contain 54 prisoners, and which were estimated at 5,500*l.* each. The committee therefore declined to recommend either of the plans, but unanimously declared that the plan of the county surveyor, for entirely remodelling the gaol, at an expense of 14,000*l.* was well calculated to carry out the system of separate confinement. The chairman, Mr. George Banks, M.P. said he had had some conversation with persons conversant with this subject since he last attended these sessions, more particularly with one of the worthy aldermen of the City of London, who had directed his attention to separate confinement, indeed had issued a publication on the subject; and certainly, as far as that publication went, it would induce them to postpone any discussion upon the matter, for it was the opinion of the writer that separate confinement, where it had been tried, had not succeeded; and he asserted that in America, where it had been tried on a large scale, it had been found to fail so entirely that it had been given up. The writer also asserted that his statements were made on the authority of gentlemen of high attainments in the medical profession, who believed separate confinement to have an injurious effect upon the mental powers. He might further add, that there was now a bill on this subject before the Upper House, brought in by the Marquis of Westminster, very much at his (Mr. Banks's) request; for he believed, from the endeavours he had made in the other house of Parliament, that it was almost impossible for any independent member to propose with success in the Lower House any measure of the kind. This bill, however, which was entitled "An Act to provide for the speedy and summary trial and punishment of juvenile offenders in certain cases," had been favourably received by all parties, and its second reading was prevented only by the present position of the Ministry. Lord Devon, who was a high legal authority, had been consulted upon it; and it was understood, that the Lord Chancellor was not averse to it. The 19th clause of it proposed to make it imperative on magistrates to "appropriate" or "provide" some convenient place for the exclusive reception of offenders committed under this Act; and, under these circumstances, he thought it would be best to delay any scheme of their own until it was seen whether or not this bill passed into a law. Some conversation followed, and the matter then dropped, it being understood that it will be revived at the October sessions, when a larger number of magistrates is generally present.

DECREASE OF CRIME IN THE METROPOLIS.—The returns of the Commissioners of Police for the Metropolitan district shew a great diminution in the number of criminals apprehended by the police. In the year 1840 the police district under the control of the commissioners was greatly extended, in which year the number of persons taken into custody was 70,717, of whom 37,559 were discharged by the magistrates, 29,076 were summarily convicted, or held to bail, and 4,082 committed for trial. Of the number so committed 3,081 were convicted and sentenced, and the remainder were either acquitted or not prosecuted. In 1845 the number of persons taken into custody was 59,123, being a diminution of 11,594; 30,317 were discharged, 23,890 were summarily convicted, 4,916 were committed for trial; of the number sent for trial, 3,548 were convicted and sentenced, the remainder acquitted; of the number taken into custody in the year 1845, 39,884 were males, and 19,234 were females; the number of male prisoners who could neither read nor write was 8,875; 27,345 could read and write but imperfectly; 3,123 could read and write well; and 541 had received a superior education. Of the females 6,388 could neither read nor write; 12,314 could only read and write imperfectly; 493 could read and write well; and only 45 had received a superior education.

PAROCHIAL AND BOROUGH RATE.—A Parliamentary paper was yesterday issued given some useful information in respect to parochial and borough rates. The total amount of rates levied by the overseers of the poor in the year ending the 31st December, 1843, was 2,676,486*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.*, of which 2,600,995*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.* was levied in England, and 75,491*l.* 5*s.* 5*d.* in Wales. The rates for the metropolitan boroughs were in the year, 973,976*l.* 8*s.* 8*d.* It appears that the sums assessed for borough rates for the year ending at the period to which the accounts had last been audited amounted to 113,778*l.* 0*s.* 10*d.*, making the total parochial and borough rates in one year 2,790,264*l.* 8*s.* 11*d.*, of which 2,712,996*l.* 7*s.* 2*d.* was levied in England, and 77,268*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.* in Wales. In the five metropolitan boroughs, Finsbury, Lambeth, London City, Marylebone, Southwark, Tower Hamlet, and Westminster, the rates levied by the overseers were, respectively, 130,127*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*, 66,760*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.*, 212,103*l.* 9*s.* 10*d.*, 197,647*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.*, 75,637*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.*, 166,818*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.*, and 126,481*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.*

LAW FOR THE LADIES.—A curious parochial discovery is going on at Lutterworth, Leicestershire, the parishioners having chosen a Mrs. Measure, the widow of a farmer, as overseer. It appears that this is quite legal, and instances are on record of the appointment of females as parish constables. The supposed ground for this apparently harsh proceeding—as the new "overseer" is 75 years of age—is, because she persists in keeping her name on the books, saving her son from taking the trouble on his shoulders. Her appointment has been confirmed by the magistrates; but she has resolutely withstood all persuasion to act, so that the board of guardians have no other legal alternative than to indict her at the sessions, and compel her.—Derby Mercury.

RETURNED CONVICTS.—The Scotia, hired convict ship, which lately left England for Bermuda, with convicts, has returned to Woolwich from the latter place, and at present remains at moorings, off the Royal Arsenal. She has brought home 120 convicts, whose term of transportation has nearly expired, and with the exception of two, retained on board in confinement, for having broken open the store-rooms on their passage home, the convicts have been removed to the Warrior, convict hulk, where they will remain until liberated by an order from the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

THE LAWYER.

Summary.

A VERY provoking mistake was made last week in directing the attention of the reader to the great case relating to policies of insurance lately decided in the Exchequer Chamber, and there fully reported. It arose thus:—The MS. of this summary was sent to the printer's, with directions to extract the name of the case from the report then in type, in order that the names might be properly spelled. Unluckily, instead of copying the name of the case reported, Clift v. Schwabe, they copied the name of the principal case cited in the argument, Borrodale v. Hunter, and the error was not seen by the editor until the next morning when it was too late for correction. We hope it did not occasion any inconvenience, although it must have perplexed the reader at first.

Lord COTTENHAM is proceeding vigorously with his work. He settles more cases in a week than did his indolent predecessor in a month. His promptness of decision is, indeed, as remarkable as the vast extent of his knowledge and the soundness of his judgment. It proves the mischief of the present union of political and judicial functions in the Chancellor, that the country should be deprived of the services of such a man by the caprices of party. We are happy to see that Mr. Justice COLRIDGE is so much recovered as to be enabled to resume his judicial duties.

An extremely dolorous letter from a suitor in Chancery, complaining of the delay and expenses, having appeared in the Times, the following commentary was elicited from Mr. Commissioner FANE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

SIR,—I observed in your paper of Thursday last, the 16th, a letter from a correspondent, complaining of Chancery delays. The substance of his statement was, that though amply provided with funds to pay for legal assistance though he had employed a most respectable solicitor—though he had given that solicitor directions to press the matter on with all diligence, and though the main point had been decided in his favour in 1831, he had been in Chancery eighteen years! had spent 2,500*l.* in costs, his original demand being only 2,000*l.*; that he had received nothing, and that he knew not when he should be out of Chancery.

The most startling part of his statement was, that in 1842, a written question was put by the Master in Chancery to a party in the cause, and that it was not finally decided whether that question should be answered till 1846. Is it surprising, that under such a system—a system which admits of a four years' discussion whether a question shall be answered or not—the cause of Bulev. Stuart, where the point was as simple, as one as ever arose, should have begun in 1793, and that 51 years after, on the 6th of March, 1844, there should have appeared in your columns a report of a step in the cause? In that case the House of Lords determined the main point in 1813, and in 1844 the successful party was still seeking the fruits of his success. Such is Chancery.

Your correspondent alluded to a publication of mine, which I have lately circulated amongst persons in authority, contrasting the methods of proceeding in Chancery and Bankruptcy to the advantage of the latter, and illustrating the bankruptcy method by the last banker's bankruptcy, which came before me, wherein 42,139*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* was collected and distributed, not in eighteen years, but in nine months and a few days, the first dividend, amounting to 20,082*l.* having been made in two months and 16 days after the bankruptcy.

I profess myself a zealot for law reform, and especially Chancery reform, and I have ever thought that no Chancery reform would be of any real value that did not, to a great extent, assimilate the Chancery method of proceeding to the Bankruptcy method. I expressed this opinion four years ago to the Master of the Rolls and some other gentlemen, who were authorized by Government to consider the subject of Chancery process, and by their desire I wrote a paper, explanatory of the details of Bankruptcy proceedings, and pointing out, I think, seven main points in which the two methods were diametrically opposed to each other, by the adoption of one set of which principles Chancery produced ruinous delay and expense, whilst by the adoption of the opposite set Bankruptcy produced speedy and cheap justice.

I desire now publicly to repeat that opinion, as the opinion of a person who was brought up as a Chancery lawyer, who has had 20 years' experience as a Bankruptcy Commissioner, and who, whether studying the law to practise it as a private practitioner, or studying it to administer it as a public servant, has ever considered that the best use he could make of his knowledge what the law is, was to consider, and, by careful reflection, satisfy himself, what it ought to be.

My motive in now addressing you is twofold. I wish to call public attention to the proposition, that the Court of Bankruptcy will furnish invaluable hints for a reform of Chancery process, and I wish to illustrate my view by shewing how Bankruptcy would have dealt with the above difficulty, which Chancery took four years to solve. If an examinant had refused in Bankruptcy to answer when required by the Commissioner, as he did refuse when required by the Master, it would have been the duty of the Commissioner to commit him, as a judge would have done on a trial at law. The examinant would have appeared by habes corpus, and, as a question of personal liberty would have been at stake, other business must have been suspended for the moment, and the point must have been decided in a few days. The Bankruptcy method would then have brought to issue in perhaps four days what the Chancery method kept in suspense four years. And why, I would ask, should a Master in Chancery not have the power which is freely conceded to a Commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy?

Your obedient servant,
Upper Brook-street, July 18. C. FANE.

REVIEW OF CASES

IN THE EQUITY, BANKRUPTCY, ECCLESIASTICAL, AND ADMIRALTY COURTS.

JURISDICTION.

The Court of Chancery does not adjudicate on questions purely legal, unless they come before it in cases requiring, in some other respects, equitable interference; but an equity may be superinduced by the conduct of the parties upon a point strictly legal, so as to render it cognisable by a court of equity. Cases of this sort frequently arise out of disputes relating to contiguous property, and in such cases the remedy is to be sought in general in a court of law, and not in a court of equity; but there are some cases, however, of equitable interference.

Commission to ascertain boundaries.—The remedy for an encroachment on contiguous property is to be sought at law, and not in equity. The rule in such cases is, that a mere allegation of a confusion of boundaries will not support a bill for a commission to ascertain them, unless there is something arising out of the conduct of the parties, or that it appears the interference of the Court would tend to prevent a multiplicity of suits. Thus, in Wake v. Conyers, 1 Eden, 331, Lord Northington said, that "A court of equity will entertain a bill for a commission where there are some equities superinduced by the acts of the parties, such as particular circumstances of fraud or confusion, where a party has ploughed too near the land of another, or the like." So in The Marquis of Bute v. The Glamorgan and Brecon Canal Company, 6 Law T. 253, the defendants had gradually encroached upon the plaintiff's land, and had let their own land to as many as fifty persons, and that was held a sufficient ground for equitable interference.

A curious case, and one of great importance to the profession, has arisen out of the allotment of the duties of his office between his clerks by Master Lynch. No less than thirty-two of the suitors of the Court presented a petition to the Lord Chancellor, complaining of the course pursued by Master Lynch in the employment of clerks in his office, which they alleged to be injurious to the profession, and a violation of the Act of Parliament for the regulation of the Court of Chancery. The principal points were, the distinction between the offices of chief and junior clerk, the one being judicial and the other ministerial; the right of the Master to apportion them; and the control and supervision of the Lord Chancellor. Master Lynch assumed that he was himself accountable for the due discharge of the duties of the office, and that he had a perfect and unlimited right to apportion them as he thought fit, and that the Lord Chancellor had no right to control him. His Lordship, however, assisted by the Master of the Rolls, took a very different view of the question, and we refer to the case (Re Whiting, 7 Law T. 173) as one well worth perusal.

MARRIED WOMEN.

After the fetter, or anticipation clause, was first applied to the estates of married women, the doctrine underwent various changes, being almost frittered away by the various restrictions and limitations with which it was embarrassed, till at last, in Tullett v. Armstrong, 4 Myl. & Cr. 390, Lord Cottenham set at rest all the doubts and difficulties which have been raised, and established the true and broad principle, that the fetter, being a creature of equity, may be moulded by the Court to suit the varying conditions of life; to attach during successive covertures, and to fall off when coverture is determined. But after the principle was thus clearly established, the application of it to the cases occurring in practice again gave rise to much doubt and uncertainty. The Vice-Chancellor of England held, in Berry-more v. Ellis, 8 Sim. 1, that where a married woman had a power of appointment given to her over a fund, and an interest therein, in default to her separate use, with the anticipation clause interposed, she might assign the interest, though she could not exercise the power. And again, in Brown v. Bamford, 11 Sim. 127, the same judge held that an affirmative receipt clause did not put the fetter on the assignment of the interest; but to do so it was necessary to add that no receipts but the married woman's would be sufficient discharges. This latter case was appealed, but, pending the appeal, the cases of Moore v. Moore, 1 Col. 54; Harnett v. M'Dougall, Rolfe; Baggett v. Meus, V.-C. W. and other cases, were decided, all more or less at variance with Brown v. Bamford. The Lord Chancellor, however, at first affirmed Brown v. Bamford; but on its being represented to him that the profession were dissatisfied, he allowed it to be argued a second time, and (7 Law T. 249) reversed his own judgment, as well as that of the Court below; and the doctrine of anticipation is once more relieved from the doubts that were cast over it, by its being held to be necessary to have negative words in the receipt clause, the Lord Chancellor having expressly decided otherwise. But in giving judgment, his lordship professed to steer clear of Barrymore v. Ellis, though how he can be said to have done so it would be difficult to shew, when he declared that the decision of the case did not in any manner depend upon the receipt clause, but upon the restriction against anticipation extending to the whole gift.

PARTNERSHIP.

Few cases under this head have occurred which are worth noticing. The acts and course of conduct of parties may sometimes make it doubtful whether a partnership exists when it is attempted to be denied, and the circumstances alone of each case are to determine the question. There are some acts, however, which are so unequivocal as to put the onus on the party denying the partnership to prove the contrary—such as serving a notice to dissolve, or the like. In the case of Smith v. Sherwood, 7 Law T. 154, A filed a bill against B and C, representing them to be his copartners. B and C denied partnership, stating that A was their foreman; but as it was in contemplation to take him into partnership, the accounts had been made out in the joint names of the three, and the tools and utensils were marked in the joint names. They admitted having served A with a notice to dissolve, and that a specification of work they required to be done described the work as being done for the three. Held, that there was sufficient evidence of a partnership.

PIRACY.

Copyright.—The plaintiff, H. G. B. had become entitled to the entire copyright of "Illustrations of the Life of L. de M." The defendant, W. B. commenced a certain publication called "The European Library," the first volume whereof was intitled "A Life of L. de M." several passages of which were admitted by the defendant to have been copied from the "Illustrations." Held, that the defendant having, by so doing, materially lessened the price of the original work, by knowingly taking a material valuable part of it, this was sufficient to constitute a piracy from the "Illustrations," notwithstanding the passages copied were stated to be quotations, and were not so many nor so extensive as to make the work so pirated a substitution for the original one. (Bohn v. Bogue, 7 Law T. 277.)

PRACTICE.

The cases under this head have reference chiefly to the changes and alterations introduced by the late Orders, and many of them are entirely useless, because inapplicable hereafter, inasmuch as they belong to the transition period at the time of the new Orders coming into operation. There are, however, some decisions which it may be useful to notice.

Varying decree.—It has been decided in Jenkins v. Briant, 6 Law T. 273, that a former decree cannot, upon further directions, be varied on a point of law, even as to a new party; but in such a case a rehearing is necessary.

Revivor.—Reviving a bill merely for the sake of costs is not admissible in practice; and, accordingly, where a decree, among other things, has directed one party to pay costs to be taxed, but the other party dies before taxation, all the rest of the decree having been performed, a bill of revivor will not lie; and when by the decree deeds are ordered to be delivered up, but there was no statement in the bill of revivor that they had been so delivered up, a plea, and not a demurrer, is the proper mode of defence. (Andrews v. Lockwood, 7 Law T. 250.)

Barristers' clerks' fees.—A case of considerable importance as regards the intercourse among the two branches of the profession, has arisen in reference to barristers' clerks' fees. It has been customary for solicitors to allow the clerks certain gratuities, but these gratuities have never been so far sanctioned by custom as to become the subject of regulation under the Orders of the Court. But till lately there had been no decision on the subject, except that, on taxation, most of the Masters in Ordinary were in the habit of allowing them. A late case, however, which arose out of the inactivity of a clerk, and his retention out of moneys in his hands of a larger fee than the ordinary table of fees justified, has settled the question of right; and it is now decided that barristers' clerks have no right to demand a fee from a solicitor who consults their masters. (Ex parte Catton, 6 Law T. 313.) In the same case it was held that the Court has no personal jurisdiction over barristers' clerks, as such; the only power that can be exercised over them is in reference to the disallowance of their fees on taxation. But nevertheless, in the case in question, though the Court dismissed the petition, it did so without costs, because of the misconduct of the clerk.

Parties.—It has been decided in Davies v. Price, 6 Law T. 274, that where one of the plaintiffs in an original suit, who was a female, married, the defendants to the original suit were necessary parties to the supplemental suit. And in Sharp v. Day, 7 Law T. 156, where no shares had been allotted in a railway company, and the scheme was abandoned, and one of the provisional committee on behalf of himself and all other parties (except the defendants) interested as partners in the company, filed a bill against some of the provisional committee, for the purpose of taking the accounts and winding up the affairs of the company, a demurrer for want of parties was overruled without costs, and without prejudice to any question in the cause.

Contempt.—Though a contempt may be discharged by a change or amendment in the pleadings, yet cases may occur in which that will not be so. A bill had been filed by the mother and next friend of an infant, a married woman, in her maiden name, and describing her as a spinster; it was allowed, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, to be amended by altering the name of the plaintiff, and by making the husband a defendant, without discharging the husband's contempt in the cause as it was originally filed, and without prejudice to the questions in a petition presented by him in the original cause. (Newenham v. Pemberton, 6 Law T. 409.)

Lunacy.—The first article of the 38th of the New Orders enables the Court to order the service of a subpoena on a defendant who is out of the jurisdiction, but it makes no provision for the case of the service on a person of unsound mind, not so found by inquisition. In Biddulph v. Lord Camoys, 6 Law T. 429, however, it was ordered that a subpoena should be served upon such a person, though out of the jurisdiction. Where a reference has been ordered in a suit in Chancery to inquire into the capacity of a trustee to transfer the trust found under the 1 Wm. 4, c. 60, and he has been reported incapable, that report will be adopted in lunacy without a fresh reference. (Re Buckle, 6 Law T. 469.)

issued have obtained an order nisi to dissolve it, unless cause be shewn on a given day, the junior counsel of the plaintiff shall on that day hand in a half-guinea hand brief to the registrar, undertaking to shew cause on next motion day, and not appear in Court for that purpose; and the reason assigned by Mr. Smith, in his Chancery Practice, vol. 1, p. 616, is, that it should not be necessary to deliver full briefs in the first instance. In Newman v. King, 7 Law T. 277, the plaintiff's junior counsel did so, but on the day on which the order nisi was to be made absolute, the defendant's senior counsel moved that it should be made absolute unless cause shewn, and so indorsed his brief; and the defendant considering the injunction dissolved, but not drawing up the order nor applying at the registrar's office, proceeded at law. The defendant was held liable to be committed for breach of the injunction, on appeal, by the Chancellor overruling the judgment below.

New Orders.—The New Orders of May, 1845, which came into operation on the 28th of October last, have greatly modified, and, in many cases, wholly altered, the practice of the Court; and notwithstanding the great care with which they were prepared, they are not altogether free from the charge of containing clauses which are, or appear to be, conflicting. The construction of several of them has been already ascertained by judicial interpretation, and the practice has been so far settled, but there is still great uncertainty. The mode in which it has been customary to issue orders contributes very much to the unsettling of the practice; for, on the coming out of a new set of orders, the former orders are not all or only in part repealed; whereas if the former orders were entirely repealed, and so much of them as should appear requisite embodied in the new issue, there would be only one set of orders to be attended to, which having been drawn up systematically, and by a person having the whole of the subject before his mind, the chance of conflicting clauses would be greatly diminished, and the practitioner relieved from much embarrassment as to his course of proceeding.

But we must take the New Orders as they stand; and, in the first place, it may be observed that as they were promulgated in May, 1845, and did not come into operation till the 28th of October following, the profession and the public must be deemed to have had full notice of them; and consequently, where a step had been commenced in a cause under the old practice, it must, after the 28th of October, be carried on according to the New Orders. This has been decided on appeal from the Vice-Chancellor of England, in the case of Christ's Hospital v. Grainger, 6 Law T. 361.

New Orders.—Amendments.—By the Orders of 1829 it was required, on special applications for leave to amend, that the Court should be satisfied by affidavit that the matter of the proposed amendment was material, and could not with reasonable diligence have been sooner introduced into the bill; now, however, the practice is altered in that respect, or rather the requirements of the New Orders are more stringent, for the 68th Order, a special order for leave to amend the bill, is not now to be made, unless, in addition to the former requisites, there is also the affidavit of the plaintiff's solicitor, that the application is not made for the purpose of vexation or delay; and it has been decided in the case of Christ's Hospital v. Grainger, 6 Law T. 361, on appeal from the Vice-Chancellor of England, that the affidavit of the solicitor's clerk who has the management of the cause will not satisfy the Order; it must be made by the solicitor himself. In the same case also it has been held that all applications to amend must now be made to the Master in the first instance, the 13th Order of 1829, which required the application, if made to the Master, to be made in a limited time, being now abrogated by the New Orders, and the time, therefore, again left unrestricted. By the 66th of the New Orders, it is declared that no further order of course is to be obtained for leave to amend after replication filed, except in the case of a clerical error; and it has been held in Hitchcock v. Jaques, 7 Law T. 2, that it is irregular to obtain an order of course to amend by adding parties, thus in that respect altering the old practice. The 38th rule of the 16th Order applies to the case of amendments after answer, and the 14th rule of the same Order to amendments before answer; and if no answer has been put in, the clerk of records and writs will receive an answer to the original bill, though it has

New Orders.—Answer.—The question as to the meaning of the words "last answer," occurring in the New Orders, has been as much agitated as it was under the old practice; but their meaning is now settled in the cases which most usually occur. In the 66th, and in the 33rd Art. of the 16th of the New Orders, they mean the last answer of the last of several defendants; but in the 114th Order, they mean the last answer of the same defendant. (Lester v. Archdall, 6 Law T. 477.)

New Orders.—Replication.—Several cases have occurred in which the pleadings in causes in Court before the New Orders came into operation were in such a state as not to come within them, and in such cases it has been necessary of course to follow the old practice. But this can only occur in a few cases which have been in court both before and after the 25th of October, 1845. In Wheatley v. Wheatley, 6 Law T. 429, a replication was filed on the 1st of November, 1844, and the subpoena to rejoin was served on the 28th of May, 1845, and nothing more was done till January last, when a motion was made to dismiss for want of prosecution, and it was objected that as the subpoena to rejoin was abolished by the New Orders, and as the replication filed was under the old practice, publication had not passed, and the motion to dismiss was wrongly made. And it was held that a fresh replication was necessary as well as an order for publication.

New Orders.—Service of subpoena.—It is at the discretion of the Court, and not as of right, that the plaintiff is entitled to have an order for service of subpoena upon a defendant out of the jurisdiction under the 33rd Order of May, 1845. And the jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor to make orders for the administration of suits in equity cannot be questioned in the inferior courts of equity. (Whitmore v. Ryan, 7 Law T. 58.) Where an infant defendant resident out of the jurisdiction has been served with a subpoena, under an order made in pursuance of stats. 2 Wm. 4, c. 33, and 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 82, the Court will not order an appearance to be entered for such infant until a guardian has been assigned, under the 32nd Order of May, 1845, in precisely the same way and after the same notice as if the defendant had been resident within the jurisdiction. (Anderson v. Stather, 7 Law T. 77.)

PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS.

The leaning of the Courts is now against enlarging the boundaries of privileged communications; and the present Master of the Rolls is especially anxious to confine himself within the limits of the decided cases; and, indeed, it is well known that his own individual opinion is against privileged communications altogether. As, however, the rule, whether useful or injurious in practice, is, at all events, established, some of the more important cases that have lately occurred may here be noticed. The cases which most commonly occur, and which are productive of by far the greatest inconvenience, are those which arise out of the production of books, &c. that are in daily use in the business of the party against whom the motion is made. In such cases, however, the inconvenience is obviated in a great measure by the practice of merely ordering an inspection of the books at the place of business, at convenient times, and sealing up such parts as do not relate to the matters in issue. (The Marquis of Bute v. The Glamorganshire Canal Company, 6 Law T. 253.)

Title.—Where documents in the defendants' possession are sought to be produced as evidence of the plaintiffs' title to a commission to ascertain boundaries, it is not sufficient to prevent their production to say that they relate to and evidence the defendant's title, and do not evidence the plaintiff's title. (The Marquis of Bute v. The Glamorganshire Canal Company, 6 Law T. 253.) So in the case of a person claiming as son of the tenant for life under a marriage settlement to be entitled to a remainder, against the trustees, one of them admitted the possession of documents relating to the estate of the tenant for life, but did not admit the son's title, stating merely his ignorance whether he was a son, a motion for production was refused. (Smith v. Dowling, 6 Law T. 497.) The plaintiff's will in Rigby v. Rigby, 7 Law T. 25, contained an allegation of his title to an estate (the subject-matter of the suit), and prayed an amount of the rents and a discovery of documents, &c. relating to the estate. One of the defendants pleaded in bar to the relief, and to a discovery of documents relating to the rents, setting forth in his answer a list of all the documents "in his possession or power relating to any of the matters in the said bill mentioned," except such documents as related exclusively to rents; the plea was overruled generally on the ground that the documents in question might in their recitals contain information to which the plaintiff was entitled on other points.

STOPPAGE IN TRANSIT.

The consignee of goods has a right to stop them in transitu any time before their coming into the actual possession of the consignee; and consequently a cargo shipped to a consignee may be stopped before its actual delivery to the consignee on the arrival of the ship; and in like manner goods sent by a carrier before actual delivery to the consignee may be stopped in transitu; but if the consignee is substantially the owner of the vessel in which the goods are shipped, the stoppage in transitu determines immediately on the shipment, for it is equivalent to a delivery to the consignee at his own store. (Re Humberstone, 6 Law T. 469.)

TITLE.

It is now admitted on all hands that if the object of the legislature in passing the late Statute of Limitations was the shortening the period for which titles were to be deduced, they have failed in arriving at the result that was expected. Even in tracing title to a leasehold for lives, a title must be shewn of the same length as in the case of a fee-simple. This was first decided in the case of Cooper v. Emery, 1 Phill. 388, and in such cases it is now necessary to shew a sixty years' title. In the case of Hodgkinson v. Cooper, 6 Law T. 451, the vendors of a lease for lives, held under an eleemosynary corporation, which had been granted in consideration of the surrender of a former lease, were held to be bound to shew that the grantee was legally and equitably entitled to the old lease at the time of the surrender, or, in other words, to shew a sixty years' title.

Conditions of sale.—A very strong case of forcing a bad title upon a purchaser under a condition to accept the vendor's title without dispute occurred in Duke v. Bennett, 6 Law T. 478. There, in an agreement for a lease, a further agreement was made for the purchase and conveyance of the inheritance upon the lessee's electing to take it, but he was, in such case, to accept the vendor's title without dispute. He did elect, but afterwards objected that there was an outstanding legal estate in part of the property by reason of an incumbrance which had been released, but he was compelled to take without the objection being removed, and would have been so, "though the title had been plainly bad."

PROMOTIONS, APPOINTMENTS, ETC.

Clerks of the Peace for Counties, Cities, and Boroughs will oblige by regularly forwarding the names and addresses of all new Magistrates who may qualify.]

SWEARING-IN OF THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—The Right Hon. Maziere Brady, accompanied by Christopher Fitzsimon, Esq. clerk of the Crown and Hanaper, proceeded to Maryborough, to take the oaths of office as Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and to receive the Great Seal from Mr. Justice Burton, the commissioner. After the usual ceremonies, the members of the house bar waited upon the new Lord Chancellor, to convey their congratulations upon his appointment. After luncheon at the judge's lodgings, the Lord Chancellor and Mr. Fitzsimon took their departure from Maryborough, and arrived in town the following evening.

COUNSEL TO THE CHIEF SECRETARY.—Mr. Stephen Flanagan, of the Munster bar, nephew of the late Chief Baron Woulfe, a young man who promises to be a distinguished ornament to his profession, has been appointed counsel to the Chief Secretary.

Mr. Dundas took the usual oaths on his appointment of Solicitor-General, before the Lord Chancellor, on Saturday last, in his lordship's private room in Lincoln's-in Hall.

MR. SERJEANT STOCK.—The Limerick Reporter says that Mr. Serjeant Stock has been appointed to the vacant Mastership in Chancery. The learned Serjeant is at present Judge in the Admiralty Court in Ireland, a very minor appointment; the salary, I believe, not more than 600*l.* a year, represented the borough of Cashel in Parliament for several years, and up to a recent period, when, declining to take the repeal pledge, his constituents called on him to resign. Alderman O'Brien, M. P. a repealer, displaced Serjeant Stock at Cashel during the repeal enactment. Serjeant Stock is son of the late Right Rev. Dr. Stock, who filled the see of Killala, in the west of Ireland, at the period of the landing of the French in 1798. Mr. Baldwin, assistant-barrister for Cork, has also been spoken of; so has Mr. James O'Brien, Q.C. Mr. Baldwin's present place is worth 1,200*l.* a year.

COUNSEL TO THE IRISH OFFICE.—The following paragraph appears in the Irish correspondence of a contemporary:—"There is a good deal of speculation here as to the appointment of counsel to what is called the Irish Office in London. It is understood that the new Lord Chancellor has a candidate, but his qualifications for an office requiring not only minute acquaintance with the technicalities of the profession, but some knowledge of the country and its politics, are not considered by any means such as would justify his appointment, and are at any rate thrown into the shade by those of a member of the English bar who has for many years taken an active part in Irish politics, and who is said moreover to possess very strong claims upon several members of the present government." The gentleman referred to is, we believe, Mr. David Leahy. It would be difficult to find a second person who could bring to the discharge of the duties of the office in question so many and such high recommendations as those possessed by Mr. Leahy. That he has done important services to the Irish branch of former liberal governments may not, perhaps, be considered as constituting a claim upon the present ministry; but the fact of his being eminently qualified to assist in carrying out the principles of Irish policy now professed by this cabinet, principles which Mr. Leahy has been greatly instrumental in rendering acceptable to the English public, will no doubt have its weight with a ministry which has displayed much judgment in the selection of its instruments.—Morning Chronicle.

LEGAL INTELLIGENCE.

NORFOLK CIRCUIT.

HUNTINGDON, JULY 17.—Their Lordships arrived at an early hour this morning, and, having opened the commission and attended divine service, took their seats in their respective courts at twelve o'clock.

The business here is of its usual quality, there being one cause and eight prisoners. The cause occupied Mr. Justice Williams and four learned counsel for three hours, when, their united efforts being unequal to the task of wading through the subject-matter, which was one of a most tedious character, its further consideration and the adjustment of a long account between the parties was referred to an arbitrator. The prisoners were then taken in both courts, and by six o'clock the whole business of the Huntingdonshire sessions was concluded, though the calendar embraced three charges of cutting and stabbing, and two of arson.

CAMBRIDGE, JULY 18.—The commission has just been opened for this county.

The calendar contains the names of twenty prisoners, and we are sorry to observe that no fewer than twelve of these are charged with the crime of arson. With the exception of one case of manslaughter and another of rape, the rest of the calendar may be said to be trifling in the quality of the offences.

JULY 20.—Mr. Baron Alderson took his seat this morning at nine o'clock, there being a light entry of nine causes. Of these two were undefended, and two special-jury causes. All the defended common-jury causes were disposed of in the course of the day, but neither of them involved any question or facts of importance or interest, save to those immediately concerned therein.

MIDLAND CIRCUIT.

OAKHAM, FRIDAY, JULY 17.—Mr. Justice Paterson arrived at half-past ten o'clock, and shortly after proceeded to the Castle. His lordship adverted to the light state of the calendar, which exhibited two cases only, one of which was for cutting and wounding, and the other for setting fire to a lock-up house at Oakham; there was not, however, evidence to go to the grand jury, whereupon the indictment was abandoned. On the Nisi Prius side there was no entry for trial whatever. The only case indeed expected to be tried at these assizes is that of the Syston and Peterborough Railway Company v. Lord Harborough, a case arising out of long standing disputes between Lord Harborough and the Syston and Peterborough Railway Company, and which have already formed the groundwork of two trials at Oakham. On the present occasion the cause was laid for Rutlandshire; it has, however, on account of the leading counsel on the Midland Circuit being detained at Northampton in a like case, been transferred to Nottingham.

NOTTINGHAM, JULY 23.—The cause list contains 11 cases; also an indictment at the instance of the Midland Counties Railway Company, against Lord Harborough and others, for a conspiracy in obstructing certain persons in the employ of the company from doing their duty. The calendar of prisoners for both town and county is light.

WESTERN CIRCUIT.

DORCHESTER, JULY 18.—The learned judges on this circuit arrived in Dorchester at a somewhat late hour last evening. The commission was then opened. Their lordships attended divine service this morning. After which the courts were opened and business commenced.

There is less business in this county than we have ever known, little as there generally is. There are but two causes on the civil side, whilst the calendar gives the names of eleven prisoners. It is consequently expected that all will be finished at an early hour on Monday.

DEVIZES, JULY 22.—The commission for the county of Wilts was opened yesterday in this place. After attending divine service at the church, the learned judges proceeded to the County-hall, the courts were opened, and business commenced.

There is very little to be done here. There are eight causes entered for trial, of which six are already disposed of. The calendar contains the names of twenty-five prisoners; of these, three are charged with the crime of arson, one with cutting and wounding, one for bigamy, one an assault with intent, &c. and one with false pretences. The others have been committed for minor offences.

HOME CIRCUIT.

MAIDSTONE, JULY 22.—The business for the county of Kent commenced yesterday morning. Mr. Baron Parke sat on the civil side, and Mr. Justice Coltman presided in the Crown Court. There were thirty-seven cases entered, five of which appeared to be special jury cases, but it is understood that three of them, which involved the question of gavelkind tenure, will not be tried. In the Crown Court there were fifty-three prisoners for trial, but most of the cases were of the ordinary description.

OXFORD CIRCUIT.

WORCESTER, JULY 18.—Yesterday afternoon Mr. Serjeant Gazelee opened the commission with the usual formalities, and then proceeded, with Mr. Justice Maule, to attend divine service at the Cathedral. In the calendar the names of 35 prisoners may be thus analyzed:—Perjury, 3; rape, 4; bigamy, 1; cutting and wounding, 7; burglary, 2; not surrendering for examination before a district Court of Bankruptcy, 1; sheepstealing, 1; robbery with violence, 5; uttering false coins, 1; wilfully destroying property, 1; larceny, 7.

There are 16 causes on the list, two of which are to be tried by special juries.

STAFFORD, JULY 23.—The commission of assize for the county was opened to-day by the right hon. Sir Thomas Wilde, the recently appointed Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas. Mr. Justice Maule is expected from Worcester this evening. The calendar is light almost beyond precedent; at present it contains only twenty-seven prisoners. Of these, one is indicted for wilful murder, three for killing and slaying, three for cutting and wounding, one for concealment of child-birth, one for administering poison, one for forgery, two for burglary, one for embezzling a letter from the post-office, three for assaulting and stealing from the person, two for felony, &c. The cause list will, it is believed, be lighter than usual.

SUDDEN DEATH OF MR. WAKEFIELD, Q.C.—We regret to announce the sudden death of Mr. Daniel Wakefield, the well-known Queen's counsel, who was found dead in his shower bath at an early hour on Tuesday morning. Mr. Wakefield was in perfect health on Saturday, and was to have replied in a cause in the Vice-Chancellor's Court on Tuesday.

THE LATE DANIEL WAKEFIELD, Esq. Q.C.

CORONER'S INQUEST.—An inquest has been held by Mr. Wakley, M.P. on view of the body of Daniel Wakefield, Esq. one of her Majesty's counsel, aged 69, who expired suddenly on the afternoon of last Sunday, the 19th instant. The court assembled at the Royal Standard public-house, in Sale-street, close by the residence of the deceased, No. 5, Cambridge-terrace, Edgware-road.

Mary Brind, housemaid to the deceased, deposed as follows:—Mr. Wakefield was a barrister-at-law, and resided at No. 5, Cambridge-terrace, Edgware-road. His age was 69. He expired at one o'clock on the afternoon of the 19th, in the presence of witness, Mr. Pearson, and Miss Clarke (his adopted daughter), both of whom resided in the house. First noticed his illness at a quarter-past nine on the same morning, having proceeded to his room in consequence of a remark from Miss Clarke to the effect that her master must be ill, or he would have come down stairs at his usual time for breakfast. Having knocked, without receiving any answer, witness entered, and found deceased in a bath chair, quite senseless. Witness then ran down stairs, and sent the male servant, Kilby, for Mr. Howlett, surgeon, who was quickly in attendance, and applied various remedies. Dr. Chowne was shortly afterwards summoned. Both gentlemen remained almost up to the last moment, but although Mr. Wakefield breathed in a laboured manner, he never spoke afterwards, and died at one o'clock. Up to about three weeks since the deceased had continued apparently in the enjoyment of good health. He then complained of some internal disorder. Dr. Chowne, at the request of Miss Clarke, visited him; but he declined his advice, and insisted upon doctoring himself.

Other witnesses were examined, and the jury returned a verdict of died from natural causes.

Mr. Wakefield was the son of the eminent Mrs. Priscilla Wakefield, the original promoter of Savings Banks—a lady who, it may be added, was cousin to the lamented Mrs. Fry, and nearly related to Mr. Wakefield, the author of some works upon Ireland, to Mr. Jerrold Wakefield, author of works on Australia, and to Mr. E. G. Wakefield, a member of the Senate House in Quebec, and a writer in the Spectator newspaper.

THE MASTERSHIP IN CHANCERY, IRELAND.—Amongst the persons named as likely to succeed the late Master Gould, are Mr. Sergeant Stock (now one of the judges of assize on the Munster circuit); Mr. Baldwin, assistant-barrister for the East Riding of York county; and Mr. Sergeant Howley, assistant-barrister for the county of Tipperary.

MEDICAL MEN AND LIFE ASSURANCE OFFICES.—At the Provincial Medical Association now meeting at Norwich several professional gentlemen complained of having been put to great inconvenience, and injured in their calling, in consequence of the authorities of life assurance offices giving up the confidential communications required from medical practitioners, as to the health of their patients about to effect insurances on their lives. The members present debated the subject of the propriety or impropriety of furnishing the necessary statements, and eventually resolutions were unanimously adopted to the effect, that the members were of opinion that the insurance offices had no claim whatever on the private medical attendant of any candidate for life assurance, for an opinion on the state of his or her health, every office having medical referees of their own, on whose opinion they ought to rely. It was also resolved, that copies of the resolutions should be sent to all the offices for life assurance.

We have authority for stating, that the old Scotch title of Viscount Preston is about to be assumed by Sir Robert Graham, Bart., of Esk, in Cumberland, who is now residing at Cheltenham. The father of this very ancient baronet succeeded his cousin Charles as fourth Viscount, in 1780, but not succeeding to the family estates (which are in the hands of Sir J. Graham, late Home Secretary) at his lordship's decease in 1774, his eldest son Charles allowed both the baronetcy and viscountcy to lie dormant; he dying in 1795, his next brother became heir, and in 1809 took up the inferior title of baronet. For cogent reasons connected with mercantile engagements in the City of London, Sir Robert has deferred assuming his dignity until the present period, when, at the earnest solicitation of his friends, he is induced to add to it, for the advantage of his family.

ARREARS OF BUSINESS IN THE LAW COURTS.—The amount of business in arrears in the Law Courts still continues undiminished. In the Court of Queen's Bench the following are the number of causes which remained undecided at the close of the last sitting, viz. for Middlesex, Special Juries, 50; Common Juries, 99; London Special Juries, 31; Common Juries, 62. The new trial paper contains 76 motions standing for argument, among which is the important one of Woolmer v. Toby and Others, and there are also 15 motions which have been argued, but on which judgment has not yet been given. In the Common Pleas the arrears of causes are heavier than usual, there being, in Middlesex, Special Juries, 29; Common Juries, 48; London Special Juries, 74; Common Juries, 48. The principal reason of this increase arises from the fact that a great many actions respecting railways have been commenced in this court, in preference to the others, with the view of obtaining a speedier decision. The demurrer paper contains 14 causes, and there are 10 cases standing over for the judgment of the Court. Most of them, however, would have been decided, if it had not been for the death of the Lord Chief Justice. In the Court of Exchequer of Pleas there are 80 causes in arrear for London, 23 of which are Special Juries; and for Middlesex there are, Special Juries, 21; and Common Juries, 55. The causes in the peremptory paper have all been disposed of, 7 of them having been tried, and 7 struck out of the paper. In the special paper there are 40 matters remaining undecided, but two of them have been heard, although judgment has not been given, and 3 part heard. There are also 6 other motions standing for judgment. Of new trials there are only 10 remaining undecided, and 2 of these have been heard.

THE NEW COURT OF EXCHEQUER.—On Monday workmen commenced operations at Guildhall for forming a new Court of Exchequer. Until within the last few years the law courts were held in the chambers at Guildhall, but on the erection of the justice-room and other offices on the one side of the court-yard of Guildhall, the corporation also erected Courts of Queen's Bench and Common Pleas on the opposite side, the Court of Exchequer being held in one of the chambers. The complaints of want of accommodation in the court were frequent, and at last so urgent that it was resolved to improve the place. To effect the improvement, the foundation walls of stone, nearly three feet thick, are being cut away, in part, to form a new office for the town clerk.—Globe.

CLERKENWELL.—LORD BROUGHAM'S BANKRUPTCY ACT.—Mr. Jackson, a professional gentleman, attended before Mr. Greenwood, under the following circumstances. Mr. Jackson stated that his client, Mr. Baker, had filed a petition in the Bankruptcy Court, and obtained its protection. He had previously been summoned to the Court of Requests, and not having fulfilled the decision of that Court, Mr. Commissioner Heath had, notwithstanding the protection of the Court of Bankruptcy, issued a warrant for the incarceration of Baker, and he (Mr. Jackson) feared that, from some strange oversight of the framers of this Act, his client could be incarcerated. The present proceeding of the complainant was a mere trap to catch Baker, who had kept out of the way of the officers of the Court of Requests until Saturday night last, when he met Bruckley, who gave him into custody; he was, however, bailed out at the police-station. Mr. Greenwood inquired if Baker was present?—Mr. Jackson said he was not, but his bailmen were. The fact was, the officers of the Court of Requests were at that moment in the neighbourhood of this court, waiting to pounce upon him.—Mr. Greenwood said he could scarcely think those officers would venture to arrest him whilst answering a charge at this court cum deo vel redendo.—Mr. Jackson hoped the magistrate would consent to the postponement of the case until Thursday, without causing the recognizances which were entered into at the station-house to be estreated, as he wished to take the opinion of counsel. He was prepared with affidavits to show that the object was to capture the prisoner; in fact, Bruckley was the aggressor, and he was resolved to indict him.—Mr. Greenwood consented to the postponement.

ALTERATION IN THE NAMES OF STREETS.—The following streets have lately received different names from what they have generally been known by, causing a great deal of confusion to strangers, as well as the miscarriage of parcels, letters, &c. We therefore subjoin the more recent of the alterations, for the information and guidance of our readers:—Charlotte-street, Bloomsbury, and Plumtree-street, Holborn, are now called Bloomsbury-street; Hanover-street, Long-acre, Belton-street, and the Bowl-yard, are now united, and called Endell-street; Petticoat-lane, Whitechapel, now bears the name of Middlesex-street; Water-lane, Fleet-street, is now called White-fars-street; Monmouth-street, St. Giles's, is now Dudley-street; Leg-alley, Long-acre, is now Langley-court; and Phoenix-alley is Hanover-court; Shire-lane, Fleet-street, is Lower Serle's-place; and Charles-street, Covent-garden, is now called Wellington-street North.

A curious dog cause was tried on Thursday week, at Rouen. Some time ago a sporting dog entered voluntarily into the house of a lady, and made himself so completely at home that she fancied he must belong to one of her relations, or, at least, some intimate friend, and therefore did not drive him out. A little while afterwards a M. Lainé of the town, who was going away by the railroad, called upon the lady to take leave. Admiring the animal, he caressed it, and the canine visitor, evidently sickle in his affection, left the lady, and followed M. Lainé to the railway station, jumping into the carriage with him. The people at the station, however, objected to his remaining, because he was not muzzled according to the regulations of the company. M. Lainé, therefore, finding that his chance friend was likely to be of more trouble than profit to him, and might make him lose his passage, turned him out of the carriage and drove him off. The disappointed beast dropped his ears, put his tail between his legs, and disappeared. After an absence of several days, M. Lainé returned to Rouen, and was almost immediately on his arrival served with a process at the suit of M. Hébert, an avoué, for damages for the loss of his dog, valued by him at 400 francs. At the hearing, the circumstances were fully gone into, and it was clearly proved that M. Lainé had not used any means, even in the first instance, to entice the dog to follow him; nevertheless, he was adjudged to pay M. Hébert 300 francs as the value of the lost dog, because he had not, as required by article 1374 of the Code Civil, conducted himself towards it en bon père de famille.

A DUEL SELON LES REGLES.—A letter from Munster states a duel took place close to that town, under the sanction of one of the tribunals of honour now established throughout the Prussian army. It appears that Baron de Denkhans, a lieutenant of the 11th regiment of Hussars, having, when playing billiards, used some insulting expression to Lieut. de Bounhart, of the 13th infantry, the latter brought the matter before the Tribunal of Honour of the place. The Court endeavoured to induce the offending party to retract the expression used; but finding this to be impossible, it authorised a duel with sabres between the parties. The meeting took place near the town, at three in the afternoon, in presence of an immense crowd. A stand was erected at one end of the lists for the judges, who took their seats, dressed in full uniform. On the arrival of the combatants, a new attempt was made to effect a reconciliation, but, on its proving unsuccessful, the opponents were directed to choose out sabres with their eyes blindfolded, and then, with head bare, and in their shirt-sleeves, to commence the attack. They fought with great determination, M. de Bounhart receiving two slight cuts on the arm; but soon afterwards giving M. de Denkhans a severe wound on the thigh, which prevented his standing; the fight was declared at an end. After the first medical aid was given, the judges recommended the disputants to be reconciled, which they consented to, and shook hands, amidst the cheers of the multitude. All the parties concerned then withdrew. This is the first duel authorised by any tribunal of honour, reconciliation having been effected in all the other cases brought before them.

WILLS LATELY PROVED.—The late Right Hon. T. Tibbitts, Viscount Hood, of Witley Abbey, near Coventry, left the interest of 4,000l. to his mother the Hon. Caroline Hood, for her life. The remainder of his personal estate, which was valued for duty at 35,000l. he leaves to his countess and younger children. To the former he has also left his carriages, horses, farming stock, furniture, books, and jewels, and the plate bearing the family arms to her during her life. He has left three sons and one daughter.

General Sir Henry Bayly, C.B. Colonel of the 8th Foot (King's regiment), who died in April last, at the advanced age of eighty, by his will, executed in August, 1845, has directed 2,000l. to be invested for the benefit of Hugh Forbes, late of the Coldstream Guards, and 3,000l. equally between Hugh Forbes the younger, and Archibald Forbes. The personal effects were estimated at 6,000l.

The late Sir William Boothby, bart. of Ashborne-hall, Derby, Receiver-General of her Majesty's Customs, had made his will in 1833, during the lifetime of his former wife, Lady Boothby, and, in the event of her surviving, had made a provision for her of 300l. a year; but Sir William did not alter his will on his intermarriage with Mrs. Nesbitt, nor has he made any testamentary disposition in her favour. To his daughters, Louisa, Caroline, and Maria, he leaves 3,000l. each; and as the late Earl of Liverpool has amply provided for two of his children, Cecil and Fanny, he leaves to them as a mark of affection, 100l. each. The residue of his property, real and personal, he leaves to his son, Sir Brooke William Robert Boothby, bart.

PROCEEDINGS OF LAW SOCIETIES.

YORKSHIRE LAW SOCIETY.

A general meeting of the Yorkshire Law Society, held at Wian's Hotel, York, on Monday, the 20th July instant,

E. N. ALEXANDER, Esq., the President, in the chair,
The following report of the committee of management was submitted to the meeting:—

The Committee have to report, that in compliance with a resolution of the general meeting of the society, held at the spring assizes of this year, they forwarded copies of the resolutions adopted at that meeting, relating to Lord Campbell's Bill for the General Registration of Deeds in England and Wales, to the members of Parliament for the city and county of York, the boroughs of the county, and to many other members of the House of Commons, also to the Provincial Law Societies Association, the Local Associations, and to the Registrars of the three Ridings of Yorkshire. The Committee have also forwarded petitions to Parliament against the Bill, the one to the House of Lords having been presented by Lord Lyndhurst, then Lord Chancellor; they have also caused to be printed, and circulated in York and the neighbourhood, an address to the owners of real property on the subject.

In the West Riding of Yorkshire, in Gloucestershire, Somersetshire, and other places, a strong feeling of hostility has been manifested to this Bill, and, no doubt, a general opposition to it would have been shewn, but on account of its not being pressed forward with vigour, and the recent ministerial changes having rendered the passing of the measure into a law, in this session of Parliament, not very probable.

With whatever satisfaction the Committee may have observed the general disposition to resist this measure, their feeling is one of regret that the author of it should so repeatedly attempt to force it upon the public. It is a theoretical and impracticable scheme; and, although it might suit the views of the owners of very large estates, situate in various parts of the kingdom, to have their titles registered in one office in London, yet to the immense number of small proprietors such a central registration, with its attendant searches, would be so expensive as to render the transfer of small properties impracticable.

The Committee, on further consideration of the subject, are more than ever convinced that any system of registration (if adopted at all) in order to be useful and cheap, must be local, and for districts in extent not larger than the present counties.

The attention of the Committee has been directed to the Bill for shortening conveyances; they do not recommend any opposition to the Bill, as they are convinced their interests and those of the public are identical; but it would have been more satisfactory had the measure been prepared and conducted by parties well acquainted with the law of real property; from such persons, scientific and practical improvements might have been expected, instead of the clumsy contrivance of enacting that the marginal notes to a book of precedents in conveyancing shall mean all the words contained in the precedents themselves; and the Committee are of opinion that a proper adjustment of the stamp duties, and the abolition of the lease for a year stamp, are essential to a proper system of short conveyancing. While on this subject, the Committee cannot help referring to the extraordinary evidence lately given before the Committee of the House of Lords on the burdens on real property, that the average expense of conveyances of small properties is from 30 to 40 per cent. upon the purchase money; this statement, as is well known to the profession, is not founded in fact, the amount of expense being greatly exaggerated, and the disproportionate expense of conveying small properties is chiefly to be attributed to the unequal and oppressive scale of stamp duties.

Having regard to the just requirements of the public, the Committee are of opinion that a Bill for the more easy recovery of small debts ought to be passed, and they therefore do not recommend any opposition to the Bill now before Parliament, although the injustice of restricting the recompense due to the profession for their services to a sum utterly inadequate is repeated.

In conclusion, the Committee beg to assure the Society that their attention shall be directed to forwarding as much as is in their power all measures for the reform of the law by which the public may be benefited, as they are convinced that whatever changes in the law will be of advantage to the public will also be conducive to the interests of the profession; on the other hand, they will endeavour to counteract as much as possible the incessant endeavours to centralize all public offices in London, including the registration of deeds, and the proving of wills there, at great cost and inconvenience to the public at large.

CORRESPONDENCE.

STATE OF THE PROFESSION.

SIR,—I should like to be informed—if any one of your numerous readers knows, and will say—what is the use of the Incorporated Law Society.

Are the candidates for admission as attorneys really examined? Are any ever "picked?" Or is the examination little better than it used to be? Or is it such that persons may easily be crammed for it?

I have twice attempted to bring the society into what I assumed was its legitimate action in behalf of the Profession, and in vindication of its rights. But the Council declined to act or interfere.

I should like to know what they will do.
Do any of your readers suppose they would notice the case of a person in my neighbourhood who, through not an attorney, is frequently advertised as such in partnership with a brother who is one?

The law-menders of the present day (who remind one of the scientific Solons of the first French revolution) seem to be utterly regardless of one great portion of their subject,—the lawyers,—the persons by whom their laws should be learned, administered, dealt with, and carried into effect. Why does not the association come forward in our behalf? Is it not as important to society to have good lawyers, as to have good laws? I suppose the most active men in these matters are a few persons who have little else to do, and are compelled by restless vanity to thrust themselves upon public notice in connection with the law. Why then do not those who are practitioners and know the evils of suddenly and hastily unsettling every thing and disturbing existing civil institutions and principles, and who know their own real importance in the community, and who pretend to represent the Profession,—why do not they exert themselves, not to oppose amendments of the law, but to control them in a proper manner, and preserve the existence of the present race of lawyers? Otherwise, the evils which the law-menders seem to destroy will be multiplied in other shapes, while infinite doubts and difficulties, and consequent litigation, will be reserved for the profit of a future generation of practitioners, not half so respectable as that which is now being sacrificed.

It would seem that there are to be but two classes, the judges and the suitors. Advocates and attorneys are to be rendered unnecessary. Every man is to be his own lawyer; and judges need not be selected from a class of men who have had either study or practice. Surely the men who contemplate such changes will not live to fill the offices which they are fitting for themselves!

I observe one of your correspondents has noticed that the probable effect of the statutory forms will be that auctioneers and schoolmasters will become the conveyancers of the country. I believe it. And he might have added, sheriff's officers. These men already have printed forms of bills of sale, by means of which they lend money to the necessitous tradesmen, and then whip them for their folly in placing themselves in the hands of any others than respectable attorneys. —I am, Sir, &c.

AN ATTORNEY.

SMALL DEBTS ACT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—I take the liberty of calling your attention to the Bill now before Parliament, entitled "An Act for the more easy recovery of Small Debts and Damages in England," which professes for its object the administration of justice at a very cheap rate.

Its failure will be apparent, if attention be paid to some of the clauses of the Bill.

The first I notice is the 46th, which gives jurisdiction to the Courts to hold pleas in personal actions not exceeding 20*l.* whereby questions of difficulty, requiring the first legal talent to advocate and determine the rights of the parties, are to be confined to a Court consisting of one individual, who, by the 57th clause, is to be the judge both of the law and the facts, in every species of action, of assumpsit, covenant, case, debt, detinue, trover, and trespass; and from whose decision there is no appeal. This is implied by the 68th clause, and by the 110th and 112th clauses. It may be objected, that the Bill gives a remedy for any difficulty which may arise from the 78th clause by providing that, by leave of a judge of a superior court, upon terms, any action commenced in the local court, in which the debt or damages claimed shall exceed 5*l.* may be removed into the superior courts. In the majority of cases, this provision would be a dead letter, for it must continually happen that the parties will be poor, and unable to find the security required by the 78th clause; yet the case may be one which requires the gravest legal experience. The Bill also will work with great inconvenience and injustice to a plaintiff, who must adopt the same unsatisfactory method of obtaining a trial, in one of the superior courts, to avoid the certainty of being deprived of his costs, should he succeed on the trial, or of being compelled to pay costs, as between attorney and client, should the defendant be the successful party; for the certificate mentioned in the 120th clause would scarcely ever be granted, in the face of the 46th section, save in a very few actions ex delicto.

With respect to the jurisdiction, it does not by the Bill appear whether these Courts are to decide according to the common and statute law, or the rules of equity and good conscience; consequently, there will be no certain rule for parties to abide by; and whether a defence at common law, statute, or according to equity, will be set up, cannot be known until after action brought. The 64th clause mentions five statutory defences in answer to an action; but, surely, there are many other good and bona fide defences which a defendant ought to be permitted to set up, but which this Bill does not anticipate. The fair conclusion to be therefore drawn is, that every case will be determined according to the impulse of the judge, and without regard to any established rule of law or equity.

The 66th clause of the Bill is no answer to this objection; it empowers five of the superior judges to make rules to regulate the practice of the county courts, to frame the forms, and to keep books of account. It cannot surely be argued that the judges are thereby empowered to lay down what law shall be administered in these courts, and therefore the public will be in a state of uncertainty as to their rights and liabilities. If Court of Requests law is to prevail, this uncertainty will be a crying evil; it is but too generally known already how unsatisfactorily justice is administered in those courts. There will be an end to all law and justice in causes of action not exceeding 20*l.* The fact that the Bill in cases where the amount in dispute shall exceed 5*l.* gives either party the right of demanding a jury of five, or where the amount in dispute shall not exceed that sum, gives the judge the power of awarding a jury of a like number, upon the application of either party, does not obviate the objection to this summary jurisdiction. It is an assimilation to the practice of the Middlesex County Court, which is composed of three suitors or jurymen, and the judge or county clerk; and it is proverbial that cases are decided with such rail-road rapidity in that court, as to render the name of justice a farce. Hence, no doubt, the reason why the jurisdiction has never been extended beyond 40*s.*; and from the general tenor of this Bill, there is every reason to suppose that the practice of the Middlesex County Court will be substantially adopted in the courts intended to be established both with respect to taking the evidence of the parties and their witnesses.

The 79th clause vests a most arbitrary power in the judge, by giving him the discretion to say whether a party to a suit may be represented by counsel or attorney. This provision is at variance with the spirit, and inimical to the principles, of our present constitution, for, according to the intendment of this clause, the judge is to prejudge the merits of a cause before he has heard the facts on either side; besides which it has been a long-established principle of law to allow a plaintiff and defendant the absolute and uncontrolled right of employing any advocate or advocates to support their respective cases.

According to the 46th clause, before referred to, any action on a special or simple contract may be maintained in these courts to recover a balance of 50*l.* or 50,000*l.*, and if that balance exceeds 50*l.* it may be reduced to the latter sum for the purpose of sustaining an action in these courts. This clause will be productive of that great mischief which the legislature, in the instance of the City of London and Southwark Courts of Requests, expressly intended to prevent by prohibiting the bringing of actions to recover the balance of sums originally exceeding the sums for which they were thereby empowered to adjudicate. The citizens and inhabitants of the borough of Southwark, no doubt, felt the necessity of these prohibitory clauses to prevent difficulties in cases of complicated transactions.

That an amendment in the law for the recovery of small debts is needed, cannot be denied, but that this Bill will be the very opposite of an improvement, and ought not to be inconsiderately hurried through Parliament at the close of the Session, is very obvious. In addition to which, the very serious expense which the new offices to be created under the Bill will entail on the country should be also borne in mind.

Another absurdity in the Bill is, that by the 88th clause, the debtor after judgment may be summoned to pay by instalments or otherwise, notwithstanding the plaintiff's right to payment has been proved. So, to obtain an order for payment, the plaintiff must be personally present at the hearing of the summons after judgment, and for what useful purpose, it does not by the Bill in any way appear. From the many facilities afforded to debtors to transfer their property, or so to arrange matters as never to have the legal possession of any property, the present Bill will in many respects be wholly inoperative; many creditors would rather prefer losing their debts altogether, than be subjected to the annoyance and ordeal of a personal attendance in court.

I am, yours, &c.

8, Basinghall-street. W. R. BUCHANAN.

SELECTIONS FROM CORRESPONDENCE.

The following energetic letter from "One, &c." will, we hope, find an echo.

If I mistake not, you promised in some of your late numbers, in reference to the bills affecting conveyancing, which the Society for the Amendment of the Law have in hand, to offer some suggestions as to the proper course to be adopted by the Profession. I have anxiously looked at every subsequent number, but in vain. Probably you may be puzzled what course to suggest. The apathy exhibited by the Profession is certainly no encouragement to offer advice, but this apathy is to be accounted for. The Law Institution volunteered to head and protect the Profession, and having failed in its duties, it is not so easy a matter to get up a fresh combination. Still every one can do something. There is scarcely a town in England without an attorney who acts as parliamentary agent to some M.P. or another. Pray, Sir, exhort these gentlemen to write, as I have done, to their representative, and request him, as a matter of justice, to check the headlong course of these legislative innovators; to point out the gross injustices done to the Profession, and to ask for protection, not as a favour, but as a matter of right. No great harm can accrue from suspending these Bills for a Session; and, in the mean time, perhaps the Law Institution may awake from its slumbers, or some other course may be suggested for meeting the exigencies of this case. A few words from you will have more weight than hundreds of letters from a correspondent, and, as you have promised to do something, pray hold him our deaf ears until you have ascertained whether our trance is only mesmeric and transitory, or whether it is a total paralysis.

"W" submits the following query on a point of practice:—

I should be glad if some practitioner would inform me, through your columns, whether, when conditions of sale are silent as to the place for completion, a purchaser's solicitor can insist upon the vendor completing the purchase at his office, instead of at the office of the vendor's solicitor (both offices in the same place), the latter having furnished the abstract, and approved of the draft conveyance.

SATURDAY, JULY 25, 1846.

THE SMALL DEBTS BILL.

We have no inclination to enter upon a minute criticism of the details of a measure against the entire plan and structure of which we entertain the very strongest objections. Nor is that hostility based upon any paltry professional jealousies; upon a fear of injury to professional interests, or upon irrational prejudices against reform or change. It is the result of the sober conviction of reason, aided by experience, that the measure will not accomplish the ends for which it is framed, and that it is fraught with incalculable mischiefs to the administration of justice, and consequently to the general public. Correspondents have directed attention to some of its faults of structure, and they are sufficiently alarming to make the Legislature pause before it passed into a law a measure so imperfectly considered, were there but a practical man in the House of Commons to point them out to our law-makers. But when we most want an advocate, we have not one; when an intelligent mouthpiece would be invaluable, the Lawyers have no organ to speak their opinions. In the Senate they are condemned to silence. Out of doors they have no point of union, no organization, no delegated body to protect their interests and concentrate their forces. The only oracle is dumb. It is worse than worthless, for it encourages a reliance upon a self-constituted guardian who slumbers at his post. The only Association that possessed the inclination to fight the battle of the Profession has been permitted to perish from want of support. Exhortation seems to be in vain. All applaud, all encourage us to the task of rousing the sleeping giant, all exclaim against the suicidal folly of the Profession, in thus tamely submitting to invasions which by a little exertion might be so easily repelled; but none come forward to act, or shew themselves willing to aid those who are inclined to stir. Still, wearisome as is the task, and apparently hopeless, so long as a chance remains of averting the threatened mischiefs, even at the last hour, shall we continue to protest against the evils by which the Profession is menaced.

Nor is it unnecessary to repeat, over and over again, the repudiation of all selfish motives in this hostility to the Small Debts Bill. The public are only too ready to set down the opposition of the lawyers to any proposition for change, styled a reform, as the result of interested motives, as proceeding from a fear of curtailed profits. Again we say, that no such motive has influenced the opposition to this measure. We say, and we believe in doing so we represent the feelings of nine-tenths of the Profession, that to law reform, as such, we have no hostility; that to a good measure for facilitating the recovery of small debts, we should offer no objection; nay, we should welcome it with pleasure. It is to the scheme now before the Parliament that we are peculiarly opposed, for reasons often stated, but which cannot be too often repeated.

We object to the entire plan of establishing throughout the country hundreds of local courts, necessarily presided over by incompetent judges; and, from their very number, removed from the check which publicity imposes upon the proceedings of those who are engaged in the administration of justice. We appeal to all who have had experience, whether the present Courts of Requests are not the pests of the neighbourhoods in which they are planted—making a farce of justice, and a mockery of law?

But what will they be when their jurisdiction is extended to 20l.? For once that a tradesman is dragged into them now, he will be forced to undergo their ordeal five times. With really small debts, the sort of law administered there is a matter of comparatively trifling moment. But when 20l. are at issue—a sum that may, perhaps, involve a question of ruin to the one party or the other—will the tradesman be content to submit his fortunes to such a tribunal? Besides this, he must take himself from his business to turn lawyer (for he cannot appear by attorney or counsel without the consent of the judge); he must study the statutes, master the law of evidence, learn to address the jury, or be beaten by a more skilful, or more industrious opponent. Can this be a boon to the trader?

Then for the alterations in Court between the parties conducting their own cases! The scenes in the justice-room in a country town will convey some idea of the personalities that will be bandied about in the new courts. Hitherto the intervention of advocates has been deemed to perform the double service of substituting persons who have no personal differences to sway their tempers or their judgments for the embittered passions of the parties in the suit, and the scarcely less important purpose of placing upon an equality in the combat those whom nature may have unequally gifted. But these time-honoured and time-proved advantages are ruthlessly swept away by the Bill now before the Legislature.

Another mischief which it involves is the breeding of a race of pettifogging attorneys, who will practise, sub rosa, spite of the prohibition, or at least of a tribe of sham-lawyers, still more noxious, who, exempt from the jurisdiction of the Court, will be enabled to plunder the suitors with impunity.

A third objection to the passing of this measure without due deliberation, and a careful inquiry whether a better one might not be framed, is the certainty that, once done, it cannot be undone. So many interests will grow up under it in the form of officials, that it will be impossible for the Legislature to retrace its steps and substitute a better system, should the prognostications of the practical members of the Profession be verified. The details of a measure of such vast importance cannot receive the serious consideration they claim at the close of a busy Session. Time must be permitted for discussion; and if half a dozen members will insist upon being heard in examination of those details, the bill will be postponed to next Session, and then we trust the Profession will be prepared to submit a measure of their own which will accomplish the object sought by that now pending, while avoiding the manifold mischiefs with which it is fraught.

We have already indicated what that measure should be. We briefly repeat its outlines, that it may receive due consideration, and in the hope that, if approved, it will induce the Profession to take prompt and energetic means to procure the postponement of the Bill now before the House; in the full understanding, however, that the entire subject shall be resumed next Session, with purpose to bring it to a conclusion satisfactory to all parties.

The plan we have suggested, and which has been very generally approved by the Profession, is to remodel the Quarter Sessions Courts, by placing in their chairs well qualified judges, by enlarging their jurisdiction to the trial of all actions where the damages are laid under 20l, subject, of course, to a case, or an appeal, to the higher courts.

To lessen the costs, we would divide the country into circuits, as now; but the Quarter Sessions of each county in the circuit should be so arranged that it should not fall in the same week as those of any other county in that circuit. Thus, for instance, Hampshire might be the first week in October, Wiltshire the second, Dorset the third, and so on. Thus, instead of having, as under the present Bill, some hundreds of inferior judges, we should have only twelve good ones; much to the saving of expense, and greatly to the advantage of justice. Besides, there are weighty objections to resident judges. This evil would be avoided by the plan we propose.

If a quarterly court would not be sufficient for the wants of the district, the Judges might be empowered to hold monthly Courts, and to appoint them in various towns in the county, so as to "bring Justice home to every man's door."

One great object of the framers of the Small Debts Bill is to diminish the costs of actions for demands under 20l. This may be equally well effected by the measure we suggest. The fees of court should be a fixed per centage upon the sum sought to be recovered. The Attorney's costs may be on a scale regulated by the Judges, and as there would be no agency charges, he could afford a large deduction from the present scale; and the Bar might not unworthily consent to meet the general reduction by a regulation permitting the acceptance of a lower fee than that now sanctioned by its etiquette.

By these arrangements the costs of suitors would be reduced as low as by the pending Bill, but, instead of inferior judges and tribunals that would command no respect, we should have a regularly constituted Court, such as custom has made respectable in the eyes of the people, law administered by a lawyer, and justice by a jury—the watchful eye of the Profession upon its proceedings, and the substitution of calm advocates for angry parties. Law would not only be cheap but good; whereas, by the threatened courts, its cheapness would be purchased at the sacrifice of its character.

So great confidence do we feel in the superiority of some such plan as we have outlined to that now under consideration, that we believe, if it could be brought under the consideration of the Government or the Parliament, and the evils of the one and the advantages of the other pointed out, they are so obvious that the substitution of the one for the other would be the result. But for this time is essential, and therefore the first aim—that to which all efforts should now be directed,—is to procure the postponement of the Small Debts Bill to the next Session. It would not be difficult for two resolute men to obstruct its progress. Have not the lawyers two friends in the House of Commons? Would not Sir FREDERICK THESIGER give us his help—or Mr. WATSON—or Mr. BODKIN—or Mr. CARDWELL—or Mr. BOUVIERE—or Mr. CHRISTIE?

And now let it be the express business of every member of the Profession who possesses influence with any M.P. (and who has not?) to use it promptly, and resolutely to insist that this mischievous measure shall not be hurried into a law until time shall have been allowed for a full consideration of its provisions—in other words, its postponement until next Session.

NECROLOGY

MR. THOMAS GOOLD.

Mr. Goold was, with one exception—Lord Plunkett—the last star in that galaxy of talent which shone forth with such a splendid and brilliant radiance in Ireland towards the close of the last century. The cotemporary, as well as the associate, of all the bright luminaries of that day in oratory, literature, and belles lettres—of Flood, Wolfe, Fitzgibbon, Ogle—he was the personal friend of Saurin, Plunkett, Grattan, and Bushe, and took his stand and played his part in all those brilliant displays and “keen encounter of men's wits” by which the Irish House of Commons, of which he was then a member, was characterized. In all the discussions upon the Act of Union—of which he was a fierce and incorruptible opponent, as well in his speeches as his writings—he took a distinguished part; and in that arena where the prize of talent was contended for by intellectual giants, and not scrambled for by such “puny whippers” as now bear off the garland, Mr. Goold maintained his reputation, and sustained his position. He was a native of Cork, and did not enter upon the active and laborious duties of the profession until many years after he had been called to the bar, and not before he had expended a very handsome private fortune in the fashion and frivolities of the day, and, amongst others, in extensive travels upon the continent, then not easy of access, as it is now, and when the fact of having made the “grand tour” was the recommendation and the passport to society. Mr. Goold was in Paris during the great French revolution, and by accident was located in the same hotel with Danton. On those who have heard his graphic and dramatic narration of the terrible scenes and circumstances of those terrible times, and of which he was an eye-witness, an impression was created that can never be effaced. With Mr. Goold, once resolved upon achieving a great object, action was immediate. His energies and his powers were put forth with a strength and a vigour, and a perseverance and assiduity, for the possession of which few then gave him credit; and it may be said of him that per saltum he sprang into full business, and within a comparatively brief period established himself securely at the very head of that branch of the Profession which he selected as best suited to his tastes and capabilities. We have heard it stated, and by competent persons, that Mr. Goold was the best mini prius lawyer who ever held a brief at the Irish bar. Having been created king's serjeant several years ago, he was subsequently made Master in Chancery, when his zeal, his energies, and his whole time were devoted to the discharge of the duties pertaining to the office. We believe no man at the Irish bar, by his own individual labours, and unassisted by Castle or political favour, ever amassed or bequeathed so large a fortune.—Dublin Evening Mail.

THE EARL OF KILKENNY.

Died, at Ballyoonra, at six o'clock on the evening of Thursday, the 16th inst. the Right Hon. Edmund Earl of Kilkenny, in the 76th year of his age. The deceased nobleman had laboured many years under mental indisposition, but the illness which caused his death was only of a few days' duration. Dying without issue, the earldom of Kilkenny becomes extinct, but the title of Viscount Mountgarrett descends to Henry Edmund, son of the late Hon. Henry Butler, brother of the deceased earl.

SIR THOMAS GREY, F.R.S., F.L.S. &c.

This aged knight expired on the 17th instant, at his seat, St. Lawrence, Isle of Thanet, aged 72. He was the son of John Grey, esq. of Dryden, Selkirkshire, by the daughter of Thomas Stanant, esq. of Callisfordhill, Roxburghshire, and was born in 1774. At an early period of his life he entered the royal navy as surgeon, his date being so far back as 1794. In 1819, while in Ireland, he was knighted, for his professional services, by the Lord-Lieutenant of the period, and in the following month by the King. The deceased, in 1802, married the daughter of Richard Morrison, esq. of Middlesex. He, for upwards of thirty years, was in the commission of the peace for the county of Kent.

NOTICES OF NEW LAW BOOKS.

A Treatise on the Principles and Practice of the Action of Ejectment, and the resulting Action for Mesne Profits. Fourth edition, with additions. By JOHN ADAMS, Serjeant-at-Law. London, 1846. Benning and Co.

THIRTY years have elapsed since this work was first given to the Profession, and during that long period it has maintained its place in the estimation of practitioners as the highest authority on the subject to which it is devoted. Successive editions have not only adapted it from time to time to the manifold changes of the law, but have removed the defects invariably attendant upon first attempts. A fourth edition has now been called for by the exhaustion of the former ones, and the accumulation of new statutes and decisions. The “Limitations of Actions in Suits relating to Real Property,” and “Fines and Recoveries” Acts, have compelled the entire reconstruction of the chapter which treats of the title necessary to support the action, and the omission of the chapter relating to actual entry. The Wills Act, and the Act for Regulating the Action of Ejectment as between Landlord and Tenant, have led to considerable additions, and all the cases have been brought down to the present time.

A work so well known as this needs no description nor recommendation. Its name is its best advertisement. As likely to be useful to some of our readers, we make two extracts only. First, of the EVIDENCE IN ACTIONS OF EJECTMENT.

The proofs by which a claimant in ejectment is required to support his claim, not only vary with the nature of his title to the premises, but are also dependent on the position in which he is placed, with respect to the defendant. When no privity has existed between the parties; that is to say, when neither the defendant, nor those under whom he holds, have been immediately or derivatively admitted into possession, either by the lessor of the plaintiff himself, or those under whom he claims, the lessor must establish a legal title to the premises; because, as has been already observed, it is by the strength of his own title, and not by the weakness of his adversary's, that he must prevail. But where there has been a privity between the parties, as where the relation of landlord and tenant has subsisted, or where the lessor claims as mortgagee, or where the defendant has been admitted into possession, pending a treaty for a purchase or the like, proof of title is not required; but instead thereof, the claimant should prove the circumstances under which the defendant, or those under whom he holds, were admitted into possession, and that their right to the possession had ceased; together also, when the privity is not between the immediate parties to the action, with the derivative title of the claimant from the party by whom the defendant was originally admitted into possession. In these cases the defendant will not be permitted to rebut this evidence, by shewing that the title of the claimant was originally defective and insufficient, for it would be contrary to good faith to permit a party to controvert the title of him by whom he has obtained possession; but he is allowed, notwithstanding, to prove the nature of such title, and to shew, that although originally a valid one, it expired before the commencement of the action, and that the land then belonged to another, for such a defence is not inconsistent with the terms of the original possession.

In considering this subject, we shall notice, firstly, the evidence applicable generally to actions of ejectment; and secondly, the proofs requisite in support of each particular title; subdividing this second branch into two parts, namely, the proofs requisite when no privity exists between the parties, and those required where such privity does exist; and in the latter branch, giving an epitome of those cases in which the parties originally let into possession, with the privity of the claimant or those whom he represents have, and have not been estopped from rebutting such claimant's title.

Nice questions have formerly arisen as to the competency of witnesses, having some real or imaginary interest in the event of the trial, to give evidence in this action, but these subtleties are terminated by stat. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85, s. 1, which enacts that no person shall hereafter be excluded by reason of incapacity from crime or interest from giving evidence on any trial, with a special proviso that such privilege shall not extend “to any lessor of the plaintiff or tenant of the premises sought to be recovered in ejectment;” and these parties are therefore of course, now, the only persons not competent as witnesses.

Where the ejectment is brought on several demises, and the evidence shews that the title is exclusively in one of the lessors, the other cannot be compelled to be examined as a witness for the defendant, as all the lessors are jointly liable for the costs. But a joint defendant, who has suffered judgment by default, is a good witness to prove the other defendant in possession.

The title proved must not be inconsistent with the demise in the declaration. When, therefore, several lessors declare upon a joint demise, proof of a joint interest in the whole premises must be given. But, if a demise is laid by each of several lessors separately, they will be entitled to recover, whether they have a joint or several interest, for a several demise severs a joint tenancy. And in a case where a joint demise was laid by seven trustees of a charity, who were appointed at different times, and the tenant had paid one entire rent to the common clerk of the trustees, it was held that such payment of rent should enure in the most beneficial way for the trustees in support of their title as brought forward by themselves, unless the defendant expressly proved them to be entitled in a different manner. And it was considered that the circumstance of their being appointed at different times was not sufficient evidence for that purpose.

The locality of the premises as described in the declaration must be proved, but after the plaintiff has established his title to a verdict, the Court will not try the extent of his claim, as defined by particular metes and bounds.

Proof is not now in any case necessary of an actual entry on the premises. Since the statute for the abolition of Fines and Recoveries, and the provision in the 10th section of the statute 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 27, which enacts, that no person shall be deemed to have been in possession of premises, merely by making an entry thereon, the only two cases in which an actual entry was requisite, namely, where a fine with proclamations had been levied, and where the entry was necessary in order to preclude the operation of the Statute of Limitations, have ceased to exist.

It has already been observed, that the common consent rule dispenses, in all cases, with proof of entry and ouster by the defendant.

Notwithstanding the terms of the consent rule, it was formerly holden necessary to prove the defendant in possession of the premises in dispute, and plaintiffs were frequently nonsuited on subtle points arising out of this practice, quite independent of the merits of the case. But by orders of the different Courts, the consent rule is now altered, so as to include the confession of possession, as well as of lease, entry, and ouster; and no proof of possession is now required, unless there should be some dispute as to the identity of the premises, when the consent rule must be produced; but it does not satisfactorily appear from the last reported case, on which party the production rests. As, however, it ought in all cases to be annexed to the record, it is probable that the onus of the production will be thrown upon the plaintiff.

And this on the RIGHT TO BEGIN.

The advantages incident upon the privilege of the general reply, and also upon the right of making the first address to the jury, frequently cause admissions to be made by the defendant's counsel for the purpose of obtaining them, and this practice has given rise to some decisions upon the subject, which it will be useful here to notice.

When the lessor claims as heir and proves his pedigree and stops, and the defendant sets up a new case, which is controverted by evidence on the part of the plaintiff, the defendant is entitled to the general reply. But if the defendant's case is met by a new case on the part of the plaintiff, as, for example, if the plaintiff originally claims as heir, and the defendant establishes a will, and the plaintiff sets up another will, the general reply rests with the plaintiff.

If, after the pleadings are opened, the defendant's counsel expresses himself ready to admit the lessor's whole case, as, for example, if the lessor claims as heir-at-law, and he undertakes to admit the pedigree, and that the ancestor died seised, or if he claims as devisee, and the defendant admits the will, and claims under a disputed codicil, it will entitle him to open the case, and also to the general reply, if witnesses are afterwards called on the part of the claimant. But a partial admission will not be sufficient, as, for example, where the real question was the legitimacy of the defendant, who was clearly heir, if legitimate, a proposition to admit that, unless the defendant was legitimate, the claimant was heir-at-law was insufficient. So also, where the question was the competency of the ancestor to execute a deed of conveyance, a proposal to admit the heirship, and that the ancestor died seised, unless the same was defeated by a conveyance made by him to the defendant, was considered insufficient. But in a case where the lessor claimed as heir-at-law of S. R. who was the heir-at-law of J. C. and took possession of the property at the time of the death of J. C. and continued in possession until his own death, and the defendant undertook to admit the seisin of J. C. and the heirship of the claimant, but proposed to defeat his title, by setting up a will of J. C. he was permitted to begin, Lord Denman, C. J. observing, "Here the defendant admits all the plaintiff requires to entitle him to a verdict, except the single fact of the descent to S. R. that he proposes to defeat by a will which he will have to prove, and on that will is the single issue in the cause." And in a case where the real question in dispute was the validity of a will, and the defendant undertook to admit the heirship of the claimant, but who contended that he was not bound to accept such admission, because he claimed part of the property as assignee of an outstanding term independent of the will, it was held, notwithstanding, that the defendant was entitled to begin.

JOURNAL OF PROPERTY.

ON

By WILLIAM HUGHES, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

When untechnical expressions will supply the place of proper words of limitation.—There are also some instances in which words of limitation, although not technically correct, have been construed according to the intention, and have been held to pass either a fee-simple or a fee-tail, accordingly as such intention could be collected from the ordinary and general import of the terms employed. Thus, as I have already remarked, a devise to a man in fee-simple would pass that estate (supra), as will also a devise to a man and his executors (Gibb. dev. 19; Latch 30); or appointing a person his heir (Inkerar's case, Bro. dev. 38; Taylor v. Webb, Str. 301; S. C. under the name of Marret v. Sly, 2 Sid. 75; Tilley v. Collyer, 3 Keb. 589); or the executor or executrix of his lands (Marrett v. Sly, 2 Sid. 95; Doe dem. Gillard v. Gillard, 5 B. & A. 785; Doe dem. Crump v. Sparkes, 1 Dow. & Ry. 497; Noel v. Hoy, 5 Mad. Rep. 38; Hickman v. Hazlewood, 6 Ad. & Ell. 167); or devising to a man in perpetuum (2 Blac. Com. 108), or for ever (Whiting v. Wilkins 8 Vin. Abr. 208; S. C. 1 Bulstr. 219; Heath v. Heath, 1 Bro. C. C. 148); or "to a man and his blood," for the blood runs through the collateral heirs as well as the lineal (Co. Litt. 6; 1 Prest. Estates, 84) will pass the fee simple. Whether a devise to a man and his posterity will pass the fee or an estate tail, is a doubtful point, though it seems clear that a devise to a man et semino suo will pass an estate tail. A devise to a man and his heir in the singular number (1 Roll. Abr. 833; Plow. 288; Snell v. Read, 2 Atk. 645); or to a man or his heirs (Doe v. Stenlake, 3 East, 515), will pass the fee, though a limitation in a deed in the same terms would not have passed more than a life estate (Co. L. H. 8 C. 1; ib. 214, a; 5 Co. 112; Chapman v. Dalton, Plow. 286); and a limitation to A and his heirs male, or female, which in a deed would have passed a fee-simple (Abraham v. Twigg, Cro. Eliz. 478; Ide v. Cook), when contained in a will, will pass an estate tail. (Blaxton v. Stone, 3 Mod. 133; Denn v. Slater, 5 T. R. 434.) A devise to A and his heirs for their lives will vest the fee in A, because there cannot be a succession of heirs for life estates (Doe v. Stenlake, supra); but a devise to a man and his assigns will pass an estate for life only (Fisher v. Nicholls, 3 Salk. 139), where the will is made prior to 1838; but a devise in those terms in a will made subsequently would create an estate in fee simple.

When the fee will arise by implication.—In some cases the fee will pass by implication—one instance is where an estate is devised to one generally without words of limitation, and is limited over on the contingency of the first devisee's dying under the age of twenty-one years (Fowler v. Backwell, Com. 353; Moore dem. Fagg v. Heaseman, Wils. 38; Toohey v. Bassett, 10 East, 460); for where an estate is directed to be taken from an institute upon a contingency that does not happen, it shall not be taken away by any other circumstance; and as it appears that the estate of the devisee is to determine only in the event of his death, under age, the intent of the testator will be construed to mean that the first devisee should have the fee. Nor will the circumstance of the first devisee being the heir-at-law of the testator be sufficient to vary this construction. (Frogmorton dem. Bramston v. Holliday, 1 Blac. Rep. 535.) But if the limitation over had been in case the first devisee should die without issue, he would then have taken an estate tail only. (Dutton v. Ingram, Cro. Jac. 427; Roe dem. Scott v. Smart, Fearn C. R. 473, n.; Doe v. Fyldes, Cow. 833; Brice v. Smith, Wils. 1; Denn v. Slater, 5 T. R. 336; Fenny v. Agar, 12 East, 258; Dansey v. Griffith, 4 Mau. & Selw. 61; Raggett v. Beattie, 5 Bing. 243.) And even where the words of limitation are sufficient to pass an estate in fee-simple; as a devise to A, his heirs, and assigns, subject to a charge, it may nevertheless be reduced to an estate tail, by a limitation over on failure of his issue, or heirs of his body. (Dutton v. Ingram, Cro. Jac. 427; Roe v. Scott and Smart, Easter, 12 Geo. 3, Fearn C. R. 473 n.; Roe v. Avis, 6 T. R. 605.)

Alterations in this doctrine effected by the recent Will Act.—Previously to the late Act 1 Vict. c. 26, it was considered as a settled rule of law that, in order to reduce a devise to a man and his heirs to an estate tail by means of a limitation over or failure of issue in the first taker, the failure of issue contemplated must have been an indefinite failure; for where the dying without issue was confined to the period within which an executory devise may be limited to take effect, viz. twenty-one years after the lifetime of a person or persons in being, the first devisee would have taken an estate in fee subject to a limitation over by way of executory devise. Thus in Pells v. Brown, Cro. Jac. 590, where a testator devised to his son B and his heirs for ever; but if he died without issue living A, then A was to have those lands to him and his heirs for ever; it was adjudged that B took an estate in fee-simple, and that the limitation over to A was good by way of executory devise. (See also Hambury v. Cockerell, 1 Roll. Abr. 835; Porter v. Bradley, 3 T. R. 143; Doe dem. Bamfield v. Welton, 2 Bos. & Pull. 324; Sheers v. Jeffery, 7 T. R. 589; Doe dem. Smith v. Webber, 1 B. & A. 713; Doe dem. King v. Frost, 3 B. & A. 646.) When, therefore, it appeared from the general language of the will that the devise over was only to take effect on an indefinite failure of issue of the first taker, to whom the property was devised in terms in other respects sufficient to have passed the fee, such first devisee would have taken an estate tail (Dutton v. Ingram, Cro. Jac. 427; Roe v. Scott and Smart, Fearn C. R. 473, n.; Doe v. Fyldes, Cow. 833; Walter v. Drew, Cow. 372; Roe v. Avis, 6 T. R. 606; Fenny v. Agar, 12 East, 258; Dansey v. Griffith, 4 Mau. & Selw. 61); and where it was restrained to his leaving no issue at the time of his own death, he would have taken an estate in fee-simple, subject to a limitation over by way of executory devise. (Pells v. Brown, Cro. Jac. 590; Hambury v. Cockerell, 1 Roll. Abr. 835, pl. 4; Porter v. Bradley, 3 T. R. 143; Doe dem. Bamfield v. Welton, 2 Bos. & Puller, 324; Sheers v. Jeffery, 7 T. R. 589; Eastman v. Baker, 1 Taunt. 174; Doe dem. Smith v. Webber, 1 B. & A. 713; Doe dem. King v. Frost, 3 ib. 546; Glover v. Mockton, 3 Bing. 15; Goldin v. Lakeman, 2 B. & Ad. 30.)

DORSETSHIRE.—The Chettle Estate, comprising the whole parish of Chettle, nearly adjoining the Great Western-road, between Salisbury and Blandford, Dorset, was disposed of by auction, at the Auction Mart, by Mr. Leifchild, which attracted a large attendance of capitalists. It comprised Chettle House, built in the style of Sir John Vanbrugh, about 1,113 acres of down, pasture, arable, and woodland, together with the perpetual advowson and right of presentation to the rectory and parish church of Chettle. The timber, with the live and dead stock, and the growing crops, to be taken at a valuation; the whole of which were stated to be in the finest possible condition. After very considerable competition, the property was sold for 24,400l.

SALE OF AN ADVOWSON.—The next presentation to the rectory of Ickenham, situated in a beautiful part of the county of Middlesex, about two miles from the market town of Uxbridge, was disposed of by auction, by Mr. Bullock, at the Auction Mart. The annual income of the rectory was estimated at 610l. which was subject to a deduction of about 44l. 1s. 3d. for land-tax, tithes, and parochial rates. It was sold for 2,000l.

SALE OF WOLSHINGHAM PARK ESTATE.—The Wolshingham Park estate, which is situated about fifteen miles from Durham, has been put up to auction, by Mr. Single, at the Auction Mart. It included about 2,413 acres, and comprised three farms, very extensive and flourishing woods and plantations, and the leasehold and minerals, which were held under the see of Durham. It was formerly the property of the Earl of Harrington. A slate and stone quarry had just been opened. The woods were to be taken at a valuation, and it is said they would be worth several thousand pounds. The estate was put up in one lot, when it was bought in, 11,000l. being the highest sum offered. It was then put up in three lots, upon which it realised 12,900l. but at which the auctioneer said it was not sold, as the estimated value was much higher.

THE PRESENT MARKET VALUE OF LAND AND HOUSES.—Several sales of property by auction took place on Wednesday, at the Mart. The following is a list of the prices realised:—A freehold estate, at Wareham, Dorsetshire, containing 1,413 acres, with villa residence and farm-house, sold for 11,950*l.*; leasehold house in Eversholt-street, Camden-town, let at 90*l.* a year, ground-rent 12 guineas, sold for 1,055*l.*; leasehold shop in the same street, let at 110*l.* a year, ground-rent 12 guineas, sold for 1,266*l.*

AN INDEX TO THE LAW.

Just published.

THE LAW DIGEST.—A complete Index to all the Reports that appeared during the Half-year ending the 1st of January last. Price 5s. 6d. in a stout wrapper. To be continued half-yearly.

"This laborious undertaking is intended to supply the practitioner with a ready reference to all the law decided during the half-year ending on the 1st of January, and it is, if successful, to be continued half-yearly. The plan is simple and convenient. All the cases reported during the half year are arranged under their proper subjects, and these are placed alphabetically. If, therefore, the practitioner wants to ascertain what cases have been decided, say on the law of 'Executors,' he turns to that title, and under it he will find every case, where reported, briefly digested with reference to the report or reports, if more than one, where it appears. Besides this, there is an index to the names of cases, and to the names both of defendants and plaintiffs, so that if one be forgotten the case may still be traced by means of the other. The peculiarity of this work, and that in which it differs from any other digest, is, that it includes all the reports, whereas all the other digests exclude some, being guided in their selection, not by the wants of the practitioner, but according to the rivalries of publishers. The plan of this digest is to omit none, and its consequent completeness gives it a peculiar value and utility. The amount of exclusion from the other digests may be judged by this, that the Digest before us, although embracing the reports only for half-a-year, contains more cases than does either of the others for a whole year, and the mere index of the names of the cases digested occupies no less than twenty-four closely printed columns. There is also a table of the statutes cited, arranged in chronological order."

"It will not become us to express an opinion upon the merits of this publication. We can only give a description of it, leaving it to the reader from that description to determine whether it is likely to be an acquisition to his office."

VICE-CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND'S COURT.

Friday, April 24.

CHAMBERS v. CHAMBERS.

Tenant for life—Remainder—Specific legacy in leasehold property.

A testatrix, by her will, gave her residuary property, consisting, among other things, of certain leaseholds, in trust for her daughter, A. C. for life, with particular directions respecting the comfort and happiness of A. C. with remainder over to J. C. his executors, &c. subject to the payment of annuities and legacies; Held, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, that A. C. was not entitled to enjoy the leaseholds as a specific gift, but that they ought to be sold, and the produce thereof invested.

The testatrix, Dame Frances Chambers, by her will, bearing date 30th December, 1837, gave and bequeathed a sum of 8,000*l.* and all the rest, residue, and remainder of her estate, whether real or personal, goods, chattels, and effects, whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature or kind soever, that she should or might be seized or possessed of, interested in, or entitled unto, at the time of her decease, including a sum of 10,000*l.* stock, therein described, upon trust, that, subject to certain pecuniary legacies and annuities thereinbefore given and bequeathed by her, the said testatrix, and the payment of her just debts, funeral, and testamentary expenses, and the costs, charges, and expenses incident to the execution of her will, the said trustees should stand possessed of and interested in her said residuary estate and effects, for the use, benefit, advantage, comfort, and happiness of her daughter, Annie Chambers, during her life. And the testatrix particularly directed and authorized her trustees to pay or allow to such companions and attendants as her said daughter Annie might wish to have, and particularly to certain persons therein named, such salaries and remunerations as her executors might think fit; and, inasmuch as it was her earnest wish and desire that her dear daughter Annie should have her own exclusive establishment, and, inasmuch as the testatrix deemed it necessary for her daughter's comfort and happiness that she should continue to live in the same style to which she had hitherto been accustomed, the testatrix directed her trustees to see that the whole of her said daughter's annuities, as well that possessed by her in her own right, and not derived from the testatrix, as that given by her will for her benefit, should during her life be applied and actually expended for her comfort, benefit, and happiness, and that no accumulations whatever be made therefrom; and for the purpose of insuring as far as she could that her will should in that respect be performed, she directed that any accumulations should go to a certain charity by her named. And save and except such accumulations, if any, from and after the decease of her said daughter Annie Chambers, as to all her said residuary estate and effects, she bequeathed the same unto her son, Joseph Chambers, his executors, administrators, and assigns, subject to the payment of certain annuities, and legacies.

At the time of her death the testatrix was entitled to certain leaseholds under a lease which will expire in 1856, and the object of the suit was, for the Court to determine whether these leaseholds ought to be sold and the produce invested, and the dividends only arising from such investment paid to Annie Chambers (who was a lunatic) during her life, or whether the whole income of the said leaseholds ought to be made applicable for Annie's benefit, until the expiration of the lease.

Stuart and G. W. Collins urged that the property ought to be sold forthwith. (Hove v. Lord Dartmouth, 7 Ves. 137; Sutherland v. Cooke, 1 Coll. 498.)

J. Parker and Mahns, for the tenant for life, contended that the daughter, by reason of her incapability of conducting her own affairs, appeared to be the principal object of the testatrix's care, whose evident intention was, that she should enjoy the utmost extent of income that the property was capable of producing, and that, therefore, the general rule as to the property being sold was in this case displaced by the testatrix's intention. Moreover, it was a specific gift of the residue, the entire income of which was, in express terms, to be applied for the benefit of the tenant for life. (Bethune v. Kennedy, 1 M. & C. 114; Collins v. Collins, 2 M. & K. 703; Daniel v. Warren, 2 You. & Col. C. C. 290.)

Willcock and T. Turner appeared for the other parties.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—There appears to have been a certain degree of indecision exhibited in cases of this description. Lord Eldon laid down the rule; but the late Lord Chancellor seems to have shown an inclination to escape from it whenever he could; and in a certain case the Lord Chancellor thought that the enumeration only showed so much intention to give the thing in specie that the result must be different from that wherein the simplest words had been used; but this can only be sustained by the particular expressions contained in the will. Now, in the case of Bethune v. Kennedy, there was a reference to money in the funds, and for any thing I know to the contrary, there might be a very good reason for saying, that in that particular case Lord Eldon's rule ought not to be adopted. In the case of Collins v. Collins, 2 M. & K. 703, and Alcock v. Slaper, 2 M. & K. 690, which was before Sir J. Leach, there are words which might have justified a departure from the general rule. Then there was the case of Daniel v. Warren, before Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, where the testator directed, in the particular event of failure of issue, that the property should be sold; and there cannot be two sales of the same property. It is clear, therefore, that the pointing out a particular time prevented the application of the general rule that the property should be sold at the death of the testatrix. Now, according to the strict words of the will, the remainderman is to take something to be enjoyed by the tenant for life; for it is to be observed that, after giving all the rest, residue, and remainder of her estate, whether real or personal, goods, chattels, and effects, whatsoever and wheresoever, for the benefit of Annie Chambers, during her life, the testatrix goes on to say, "From and after the decease of my said daughter, Annie Chambers, as to all my said residuary estate and effects, I do hereby bequeath the same for the benefit of my son, Jos. Chambers." But how was he to take "the same," in respect of that part which might consist simply of leaseholds which may have expired in the lifetime of the tenant for life? My opinion, therefore, is, that the thing must be sold.

Friday, May 29.

LYON v. COWARD.

Will—Construction of—Issue of issue—Period of vesting.

T. A. by his will, gave certain property to such of the children of his sisters as might be living at the decease of his wife, and the issue of such of them as might be then dead, in equal shares and proportions; such issue respectively, however, only to take and be entitled to the share or shares which his, her, or their parent or parents would have been entitled unto and taken if living. Some of the children of the sisters died, leaving issue, which issue also died in the lifetime of the tenant for life: Held, that such issue took vested interests.

The question arose under the will of Thomas Ashton, which bore date the 5th March, 1890, whereby, after bequeathing as therein mentioned, he gave all the residue and remainder of his estate and effects, of what nature and kind soever, unto his wife, Lydia Ashton, James Trotter, John Bibby, and Thomas Trotter, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, absolutely for ever, or for and during all his estate, term, and interest therein respectively; upon trust, to permit the said Lydia Ashton to receive the rents, dividends, and produce thereof for her life; and on her decease, then upon trust to sell and convert into money all the said residue, and to stand possessed of the money so to arise upon trust, that they, the said James Trotter, John Bibby, and Thomas Trotter, or the survivors or survivor of them, his executors, or administrators, should divide the moneys so to arise unto and equally between and amongst such of the children of his sisters therein named as might be living at the time of the decease of his said wife, and of the issue of such of them as might be then dead, in equal shares and proportions; such issue respectively, however, only to take and be entitled to the share or shares which his, her, or their parent or parents would have been entitled unto and taken if living, provided all the children of his said sisters, or the issue of such deceased children, might then have attained the age of twenty-one years; otherwise only to pay or transfer unto such of them as might have attained the said age of twenty-one years, his, her, or their proportionate share of the said residue of his estate, paying only the interest and produce of the proportionate part or share of such child or children, or the issue of such deceased child or children as might not have attained the said age at the decease of his said wife, for the use and benefit of such child or children, or the issue of such deceased child or children, until they should respectively attain the said age of twenty-one years; and on their respectively attaining that age, then upon trust to pay to each of them respectively their respective shares of the said residue of his estate. Some of the children of the testator's sisters died in the lifetime of the widow (the tenant for life), leaving issue, who also died in the lifetime of the widow; and the question now raised was, whether such issue took a vested interest.

Stuart and Prior, for the plaintiffs, contended that the issue who died in the widow's lifetime took vested interests.

Cases cited: Bennett v. Honeywood, Ambler, 708; Macgregor v. Macgregor, 2 Coll. 192.

Jas. Parker and Follett, on the other side, submitted that, for the purpose of taking any share or interest in the gift, the issue must be living at the death of the tenant for life, and that this was all the testator intended.

Spurrier, for the other parties.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I do not require a reply, for I must consider what the words themselves mean. If a contingency has occurred that may produce a division of property which the testator did not contemplate, yet the words must have their effect. The testator no doubt had it floating in his mind that such events would happen that with respect to a child, the child might survive the wife, or might die leaving issue; but in that case a question arises whether the testator did actually contemplate the event that a child might die leaving issue, which issue afterwards died in the lifetime of the tenant for life. The words are these:—"The money to arise, &c. unto and equally between and among such of his sister's children as might be living at the decease of his said wife, and the issue of such of them as might be then dead in equal shares and proportions." The latter words must then be applicable to the shares which such issue took. "Such issue, however, only to take and be entitled to the share or shares, which his, her, or their parent or parents would have been entitled unto and taken if living." I certainly admit that the latter part of the will shows a supposition in the testator's mind that a case might arise wherein the issue would not take, but if I find the share of a deceased child given to the issue of that child, it really appears to me that the children become entitled, as tenants in common to the shares which the parents themselves would have taken. Declare that the children of deceased children are entitled, whether living at the death of the tenant for life or not.

ROLLS COURT.

BENSON v. LAMB.

March 4 and 5.

Vendor and purchaser—Specific performance—Abandonment of contract—Parties.

A contract for the purchase of a mortgaged estate was entered into between the defendant and the plaintiff, the mortgagee, with a power of sale, &c. which was to be completed on the 29th of September, and it was provided that the conveyance should be executed by all requisite parties, and if the plaintiff should be unable to obtain their concurrence, and the defendant should insist upon it, either party should be at liberty by notice to rescind the contract; and it was understood between the parties that the assignees of the mortgagor, then a bankrupt, were to join in the conveyance. On the 24th of November, the concurrence of all the assignees was not procured, and notice was given by the defendant of his abandonment of the contract. No step was taken by the plaintiff till long after, and the defendant's money was otherwise invested. A bill for specific performance was dismissed with costs, but with liberty to bring an action. The mortgagee was held under the circumstances bound to procure the concurrence of the assignees; but quare, whether the assignees were necessary parties to the conveyance, if the execution of it had not been a term of the agreement?

This was a suit to enforce specific performance of an agreement entered into between John Benson, the plaintiff, and H. E. C. Lamb, the defendant, for the purchase by the latter of a freehold house, of which the former was mortgagee, with a power of sale. J. C. Francis, the mortgagor, having become bankrupt in 1840, the mortgagee entered into possession, and the defendant occupied the premises as his yearly tenant. The principal remaining unpaid, and an arrear of interest having become due on the mortgage, the plaintiff employed Messrs. Newman and Lyon, as his solicitors, to sell the house and premises, and a negotiation was accordingly entered into between them and the defendant for the purchase thereof, and ultimately, on the 5th of June, 1843, it was agreed that the defendant should purchase the premises for 670*l.* including costs of conveyance. The articles of agreement, as drawn up by Mr. Charles Russ, who acted as clerk of Mr. Harry Russ, defendant's solicitor, and transmitted to the solicitors of Mr. Benson for his approval, were to the effect that the price should be 670*l.*; that plaintiff should, within a week, deliver an abstract of title to the premises, and that he should deduce a good title in fee thereto; that the purchase-money should be paid on the execution of the conveyance by all requisite parties, the conveyance to be prepared and executed at the expense of the plaintiff; that in case the said John Benson should be unable to obtain the concurrence of all the requisite parties in the deed of conveyance, or to deduce a title to the said premises, and the said H. E. C. Lamb should insist upon such concurrence, &c. then each of the parties should be at liberty, by a notice in writing, to rescind the contract, and at the expiration of ten days after notice the contract should be void. After the contract for the purchase, and before the draft of these articles was sent to the plaintiff's solicitors, a correspondence took place as to the conveyance, and in reference to the concurrence therein by the assignees of Francis; and in a letter of the 10th of July, 1843, the plaintiff's solicitors intimated to the defendant that they were disposed to assent to the concurrence of the assignees in the conveyance, on condition that power should be reserved to them to avoid the contract altogether if they did not obtain their concurrence; to which the defendant replied, that all he wanted was a good title.

On the 10th of July, 1843, Mr. Harry Russ inclosed the draft agreement to the plaintiff's solicitors; and in reference to the contract, the following letter passed between them:—

"Yeovil, 18th July, 1843.

"Dear Sir,—Benson and Lamb,—Make your contract reciprocal, and we will not quarrel about the terms of it. Mr. Lamb, being in the occupation of our client's premises, must either continue to pay rent, or consent to pay interest on his purchase-money to the day the purchase is completed. If the purchase goes off, he must pay you, and our client us, for business done under the proposed contract. Consent to these amendments, and we will consider the bargain struck. You may also name your own time, so that it be not more than six months, for the completion of the purchase. "NEWMAN and LYON.

"Harry Russ, esq."

To this Mr. Russ (on the 22nd of July) replied, stating his willingness to make the alteration, and naming the 29th of September for executing the conveyance. Nothing more was done, till the 26th of July, when the abstract of title was sent to Mr. Russ, with an intimation that Mr. Benson was the only necessary party to the conveyance, and on the following day a draft conveyance was sent to him. On the 29th of July another draft conveyance was sent, in which the assignees were made parties; but it was intimated by the plaintiff's solicitors, that they did not acknowledge the defendant's right under the contract to call for the concurrence of the assignees. To this Mr. Russ replied, that he would not approve of the draft, unless on the unqualified understanding that the assignees should concur, and wished to know whether the contract was to go off or not. The plaintiff's solicitors then wrote, desiring Mr. Russ to make the assignees parties, and to return the draft, which he did, having altered the conveyance so as to vest the property in Mr. Charles Donne and Mr. Charles Russ, the trustees of Mr. Lamb's settlement, by whom 500*l.*, part of the purchase-money, was to be advanced. The concurrence of only one of the assignees of Francis having been obtained, on the 24th of November Mr. H. Russ wrote to say that Mr. Lamb would not take the title; and on the same day notice in writing was given to Messrs. Newman and Lyon, that in ten days the defendant would rescind the contract, in consequence of the requisite parties not concurring in the conveyance. On the 26th November Messrs. Newman and Lyon wrote to Lamb, offering to indemnify him against any loss to arise from the want of the concurrence of the assignees, if he would waive it; but no answer was returned, and soon after the trustees of Mr. Lamb's marriage settlement invested the money in the purchase of other premises. Nothing more was done in the matter till on the 9th of May, 1843, the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to Mr. Donne, threatening a bill for specific performance.

On the 1st of June, 1844, Mr. Benson filed his bill against Mr. Lamb, and the trustees, Donne and C. Russ, for specific performance. C. Russ, by his answer, stated that all he did in the matter was done in his capacity of clerk to H. Russ; and both defendants said that it had been arranged that H. Russ was to advance 250*l.* on mortgage of the premises to enable Lamb to complete and put the premises in repair; and they insisted, therefore, that there was no mutuality between them and the plaintiff, and claimed the benefit of this objection in the same manner as if they had demurred. They also insisted on the Statute of Frauds as a defence to the bill, and claimed the benefit of it as if they had pleaded it in bar.

Turner and Butler insisted that the letters of the 18th and 22nd of July and the articles of agreement constituted a perfect contract as against Lamb, and that it had not been abandoned. It was only for Lamb's own satisfaction that the plaintiff's solicitors exerted themselves to get the execution of the conveyance by the assignees, though they were not necessary parties, there being an absolute power of sale, and a receipt clause. Time was not of the essence of the contract, and Mr. Donne must be presumed to have agreed to the alteration of the conveyance by inserting the trustees' names as parties thereto. The assignees of Francis having ultimately executed the conveyance of the premises, the trustees ought to pay the costs of the suit. They cited Seton v. Blade, 7 Ves. 265.

Kinderley and W. R. Ellis, for the defendant Lamb.—If the contract is binding, it is a clear condition that the assignees of Francis should be conveying parties, and their consent to the suit was not obtained till long after notice of abandonment of the contract, and investment of the purchase-money in another purchase. There are authorities in favour of the right to abandon a contract where there has been improper delay on the other side, and especially in a case where the property purchased was for the express purpose of occupation by the purchaser, with a view to carry on his business; and here plaintiff's solicitors had treated the trustees, and not the defendant Lamb, as the real purchasers. They cited Taylor v. Brown, 2 Beav. 180; King v. Wilson, 6 Beav. 124; Marquis of Townshend v. Bishop of Norwich, 1 Sug. V. & P. 178, ed. 3.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The correspondence which is admitted by the parties is not altogether free from doubt, and it is important to see what can be collected from it. Looking at the material letters which passed between the parties and their solicitors, and having regard to the question ultimately in dispute, it must be concluded that the intention was that the assignees of Francis should concur in the conveyance; one of the parties considering that it was necessary they should join, with the view of avoiding future litigation, and the other insisting that there was a good and complete title without any such concurrence. The agreement for the purchase had for one of its terms, that the plaintiff should procure the conveyance to be executed by all requisite parties, and from the correspondence it appears that it was well understood between the parties that the assignees of Francis were to join in the conveyance of the premises. It is not necessary to determine whether the assignees were or were not necessary parties to the conveyance, but it was one of the terms of the contract that they should join therein, and the plaintiff procured the consent of one of them. Soon after, the draft conveyance was prepared; and it is not to be forgotten what was the situation in life of the defendant Lamb, viz., that he was a schoolmaster. On the 26th of September, 1843, the concurrence of one of the assignees was procured by the defendant, C. Russ, at the request of the plaintiff's solicitors, and the plaintiff was desirous of procuring the assent of the other assignee, and had he succeeded in his efforts, he would doubtless have been entitled to specific performance of the contract. From that time, when the deed of conveyance was returned to plaintiff's solicitors, engrossed and executed by one of the assignees, down to the 24th November, 1843, whatever efforts were used by the plaintiff to procure execution by the other assignee, nothing effectual was accomplished. On the 26th November, notice of abandonment of the contract on the expiration of ten days was given. The contract was to have been completed on the 29th September, 1843, and the question is, whether the defendant Lamb had a right to take that course of proceeding? No step was taken on the part of plaintiff till long after the expiration of the ten days, and nothing was done to alter or affect the notice. No new negotiation was entered into between the parties, and I have sought in vain for evidence whereby to fix the trustees. The defendant, Charles Russ, who, it seems, was clerk to H. Russ, the solicitor of the defendant, and acted as such in the business relating to the contract, could not, in a case like the present, be held to bind his co-trustees by his acts. It was part of the agreement between the parties, that the assignees should join in executing the conveyance of the property, and I must dismiss the bill with costs, but without prejudice to the plaintiff's right to bring an action, if so advised.

WHICKER v. HUMB.

Practice—Production of documents—Inspection of documents.

If an order be made for production of documents to the Master's office, and another order is afterwards made for inspection of documents at the office of the solicitor of the party against whom the orders are made, the latter does not supersede the former, and the Master may act upon both.

This was an administration suit, and the usual preliminary inquiries were ordered. On the 11th of January, 1843, an order for production of documents in the Master's office was obtained by the plaintiff, and in the July following an order was made for inspection of documents by the plaintiff at the office of the defendant's solicitor. It now became a matter of importance to establish the domicile of the testator in the cause, one party contending that it was in Scotland, and the other insisting that it was in England; and long states of facts had been carried into the Master's office, and numerous affidavits made on both sides. And the Master, it appeared, had refused to order production of documents in his office, considering he had no jurisdiction to do so after the order for inspection, though in any case it would be necessary to have them in the office to be proved; and it might be necessary to examine witnesses in Scotland, and it would be necessary in such case to have them to produce to the witnesses.

Purvis (with him Bowen) now moved for production.

Turner and Bagshaw said an order was unnecessary; the Master might act on the order already made.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—There has been an order for production, and then an order for inspection, and I don't see why the two cannot stand together. You may inspect first, and then inform the Master which you wish produced. The Master thought the one order superseded the other, but that is not so. The order must be that the Master proceed on the first order of January 1843; costs to be costs in the cause.

VIC-CHANCELLER VIGNAN'S CASE.

July 3 and 14.

DOYLE and ANOTHER v. MUNTS and OTHERS. Original railway shareholder—Signature of the subscribers' agreement, &c.—Sale for value—Equitable rights of assignor and assignee after sale. An original shareholder in a joint stock railway company, who has paid the deposit on the shares allotted to him, and signed the subscribers' agreement and parliamentary contract, cannot, after sale of his shares for value to a stranger, file a bill in equity to interfere with the management of the company, unless he can show a personal interest in the concern secured by express contract, although, notwithstanding the sale, he is entitled by the rules of the company to vote at their meetings for the management of the concerns of the company, by reason of his having signed the subscribers' agreement and parliamentary contract in respect to the shares he has sold.

The object of this suit was to have the whole sum paid by way of deposit upon shares allotted in a railway company returned, the tokens having been abandoned.

The bill was filed in February of the present year, by Thomas Doyle and John Walter Scrivener, who had purchased shares and signed the subscribers' contract for the formation of the Southampton, Manchester, and Oxford Railway Company, against the defendants, George Frederic Muntz, Mr. Spooner, and others, who were the provisional directors of the company. It stated that a solicitor named Parsons originated the scheme of the company, the object of which was announced to supply the North of England, North Wales, and Scotland with a direct communication with Portsmouth and Southampton, and locally it was intended to supply the want of railway communication which existed in Wiltshire, Hampshire, and Buckinghamshire. It was proposed to branch miles in length, commencing at Andover, and from thence it was to be carried by two branches, one ending at Swindon, and the other at Didcot on the Great Western Railway. The capital was stated to be 900,000*l.* which was to be divided into 36,000 shares of 25*l.* each, and a deposit of 2*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* was to be paid on each share as a first instalment; a provisional committee of the defendants was formed, and the shares were allotted in September 1845; twenty shares were allotted to the plaintiff Doyle, and ten shares were allotted to the plaintiff Scrivener, upon which they each paid deposit of 2*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* on their several shares; and executed the subscribers' agreement and parliamentary contract. By the subscribers' agreement the plaintiff was bound to abide by and perform the several stipulations therein contained, until an Act of Parliament was obtained. The bill, amongst several allegations and charges of misconduct by the defendants, charged that the original object and purpose of the company had been changed, that the best portions of the line, and that which was expected to pay best, had been assigned over to another railway company without the authority of the subscribers, that this was a surprise upon them and could not be legally done without the consent of the subscribers at a general meeting duly convened, and in consequence of such proceedings they prayed that the defendants might be declared bound to return and pay the plaintiffs the full amount paid as a deposit upon their shares, with interest upon the same from the date of such deposit, or if the Court should think the plaintiffs not entitled to such return, then that an account might be taken under the direction of the Court of all costs, expenses, and disbursements which had been properly paid or incurred by the defendants, and that the amount of such costs, expenses, and disbursements, when ascertained, might be divided ratably upon each share in the company, and that the defendants might be held entitled to represent, and be liable in respect to all such shares as were reserved or were not allotted by them, or which were improperly allotted, or upon which no deposits were afterwards paid, and that the defendants might be decreed to return and pay to the plaintiffs the residue of the moneys so paid by them by way of deposit, after deducting thereout what after making such division should appear to be the proportionate amount in respect to each deposit, or that an account might be taken of all the dealings and transactions of the defendants relating to the company during the time they had acted as the managing committee or provisional directors thereof; and that in taking the accounts they might be charged with the full amount of all deposits upon such shares in the company as had been reserved, or which were not allotted, and upon which the deposits had not been paid, together with the sum of £1,218*l.* so paid for the purchase of shares, and all other moneys which had been paid out of the assets of the company, as had been received by way of profit or commission upon the purchase and sale of such shares in the company, and that the defendants might be charged with all loss which had accrued, or had been incurred by the company, in consequence of the mismanagement, misconduct, or neglect of the defendants, that an account might be taken of the assets of the company, and that some proper person might be appointed as a receiver to get in such property, or any part thereof, and that the defendants might be decreed to deliver up to such receiver all moneys and securities for money, property, deposits, assets, and effects whatsoever of or belonging to the company, now in their possession or power, and all deeds, accounts, papers, documents, and writing in their possession or power, and that such parts of any of the property of the company as might require to be sold, should be sold under the direction of the Court, and that the defendants, and officers, and servants of the company might be restrained from receiving or intermeddling with the property of the company, and that an account might be taken of all the debts and liabilities of the company.

One of the defendants, named Benjamin Bacon Williams, made his defence by plea in bar, stating that before the bill was filed, the plaintiff, Scrivener, had, for a valuable consideration, well and effectually sold, assigned, and transferred the ten shares which he possessed, and that all right, title, and interest, by virtue of such sale, vested in one Heald, as purchaser for valuable consideration, and that Scrivener, at the time the bill was filed, had not, nor at any time since had, and had not now, any interest in the ten shares, as in any or either of them, nor in the company in respect to such shares, or any other liability.

The cause now came on before the Court, on the validity of this plea as a bar to the suit.

Remilly, James Parker, Spooner, and Bazalgette, supported the plea, and said that one of the plaintiffs having no interest in the subject-matter of the suit was fatal to it; he was under no liability; his assignee, Heald, ought to have been a party; he is not so either as plaintiff or defendant; and yet it is with his assets that these defendants have been dealing; the other plaintiff has a conflicting interest with his co-plaintiff; the object of the bill is to have protection against liabilities, which are not shown to exist, and may never exist, for there is nothing to be found in this bill to show that the company purposes carrying on its operations, or whether it has abandoned them altogether.

Kempson Parker, and Hetherington, for the bill.—Scrivener, although he has sold his shares, is still recognised by the rules of the company as a shareholder, by having signed the subscribers' contract, and is still liable for the amount of his shares; he alone, and not Heald, can vote at the meetings in respect to Heald's shares, so that he in fact is the trustee of Heald, and can alone represent those shares in all dealings with the company. Heald is a stranger to the company; he cannot vote at any of their meetings; how, then, is it necessary that he should be made a party? How is it that Scrivener, who, by the rules of the company, can vote away thousands of the property of this company at any meeting duly convened, cannot come here to protect the same property from being dissipated, and the interests of the shareholders from being injured? The plea does not aver that Heald ever executed the subscribers' agreement or parliamentary contract; the bill states that Scrivener has done so; there is nothing, therefore, upon the pleadings to show that Heald is legally a shareholder in this company; there is everything to show that Scrivener still remains liable, and is recognized by the company by its rules as a shareholder; and therefore this plea is bad in not shewing that Heald has become a shareholder by signing the contracts according to the rules of the company.

Tuesday, July 14.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR (after stating all the facts set out in the pleadings,) said: The question is whether this is a good plea in bar? For the purpose of trying this I shall assume that when the bill was filed the ten shares, and each and every of them, and all right, title, and interest in and to them by virtue of the sale, were well and effectually vested in H. Heald for valuable consideration: two questions arise—first, did the fact, if well pleaded, deprive the plaintiff of all right to discovery and relief, that is, was the plea good in substance?—and, secondly, was it well pleaded? In considering the former question I shall assume the latter to be answered in the pleader's favour; the case would depend upon and abide by the same considerations as would apply if Scrivener were the sole plaintiff. If Doyle were to die before the hearing, and his representative did not revive the suit, Scrivener would remain the sole plaintiff. If that waiv of interest in Scrivener, which the plea stated, and that state of circumstances prevented him, as sole plaintiff, from obtaining relief at the hearing, the circumstances of Doyle having an interest would not alter the case, according to the decision in King of Spain v. Machado, and other cases; if the fact had been so stated in the bill it would have been demurrable; that ten shares were assignable as between Scrivener and Heald admitted of no doubt; that they were also assignable as between Scrivener and the company might, upon those pleadings, be assumed; there was nothing in the bill to exclude that, and nothing to make the assignment illegal in the abstract. Young v. Smith, 4 Railway Cases 69, was conclusive upon the point. Assuming that the ten shares were assignable, and so have been well assigned to Heald, what personal interest had Scrivener to enable him to sustain the suit? It was for Heald, not for Scrivener, to determine whether the arrangements alleged to have been come to between the Southampton, Portsmouth, and Gosport Railway, and the Southampton, Oxford, and Manchester Junction Railway, could be supported; whether they would reject or adopt the acts of the provisional directors, which the bill alleged to have been done by them without consulting the shareholders; and upon the same hypothesis the manner in which the provisional directors had dealt with the shares and the assets of the company was a matter in which Scrivener could have no personal interest so far as those acts of the provisional directors might have merely checked the prosperity of the concern; but it had been said that although Scrivener, as a retired shareholder, had no direct interest in the prosperity of the concern, he had an interest in seeing the assets properly applied to the discharge of the liabilities of the concern; but this argument, if admitted, would strike out every part of the bill, and would convert the bill into a bill of indemnity, merely giving to Scrivener a different character from that in which he appeared upon the record. It is necessary, however, in my view of another part of the case, that I should assume Scrivener, under some circumstances, to be entitled to some such indemnity as the argument suggested. The question is, did those circumstances exist here? Was the statement in the bill such as to entitle him to indemnity, treating the prayer of the bill as adapted for that purpose? I have read every word of the bill for the purpose of ascertaining whether such a case as that had been suggested on the record, but I do not find it suggested in any part of the bill. There was no suggestion of any deficiency of assets which, as between Scrivener and the other shareholders, would render him liable to contribution; nor was a case stated from which it was to be inferred that Scrivener had made himself personally liable for the demands of strangers against the company, if any such existed. The conclusive answer to this appeared to be the fact of the assignment of Scrivener's shares to Heald, and the absence of any express contract between them which would constitute Heald the owner of the assets of the company, and disentitle Scrivener to some indemnity out of those assets. A person who sold his interest in a concern could not, in the absence of an express contract, insist upon interfering with the conduct of that concern after the sale. If such a case existed, it was incumbent on Scrivener to shew it. The relief asked by the bill, unless warranted by some contract between Scrivener and Heald, was in derogation of the rights of the latter. My opinion is, that if Scrivener had sold his shares to Heald, the bill did not state a case shewing that the former had any personal interest in the concern entitling him to relief in the suit in respect of such personal interest. I shall therefore allow the plea, and give the plaintiff leave to amend, reserving the costs of the plea to be disposed of until the hearing, or until further order.

Bankrupt and Insolvent Courts.

COURT OF REVIEW.

Wednesday, July 22.

Ex parte PHILPOTT, re MISKIN.

Assignment for benefit of creditors—Fiat issued on bankrupt's petition.

Where a debtor executed an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, and shortly afterwards a fiat was issued upon his own petition, under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 41, but at the time of issuing the fiat there was no creditor who could have issued one, the Court held that the assignment was valid as against the assignees under the bankruptcy.

In this case the fiat issued upon the bankrupt's own petition, under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 41. Previous to the issuing of the fiat, the bankrupt had executed an assignment of his property for the benefit of his creditors.

Chandler, on behalf of the petitioners, who were the trustees of the deed, contended that this deed was not affected by the bankruptcy; and that the bankrupt could not by his own act render the deed invalid. At the time the fiat issued there was not any creditor who had not assented to the deed, and who could sue out a fiat upon the deed as an act of bankruptcy. He cited Tope v. Hockin, 7 B. & Cr. 101; and Burbridge v. Watson, 4 Car. & P. 170.

Swanson, for the assignees, contended that the fiat related back, and that the deed, which was in itself an act of bankruptcy, could not be set up against the fiat. He cited Simpson v. Sikes, 6 Maule & Selw. 206.

The CHIEF JUDGE said that his impression was, that it was not necessary to give any opinion as to how this matter would have stood if, when this fiat issued, there had been any creditor capable of issuing one; but he thought that, as when this fiat issued there was no creditor who could have treated the deed as an act of bankruptcy, he must hold it good against the fiat. If the assignees had wished to bring an action upon the point, he would not have precluded them; but as they declined that opportunity, he must declare the deed valid; each party to pay their own costs; but in the event of the estate not realising sufficient to pay the costs of the assignees, they ought to be paid out of the fund obtained by the trust deed, for they were bound to raise the question which had been submitted to the Court.

Circuit Reports.

NORFOLK SUMMER CIRCUIT.

Bedford, Wednesday, July 15.

NIHI PRIUS.

(Before Mr. Justice WILLIAMS.)

BAILEY v. LANGLEY.

Evidence—Certificate of Apothecaries' Company—Seal.

A certificate of the Apothecaries' Company, purporting to bear the seal of that corporation, is a document which proves itself, and requires no authentication of the seal attached to it.

Assumpsit for an apothecary's bill.

Byles, Serjt. (with him Keane) for the plaintiff, put in a certificate from the Apothecaries' Company to the plaintiff, authorizing him to practise as an apothecary. This document bore a seal which purported to be that of the corporation, but none of the witnesses could profess to identify or authenticate it as being an impression from the seal of that body.

Worledge, for the defendant, thereupon objected that the case for the plaintiff had failed. The plaintiff was bound to shew that he had practised as an apothecary on the 1st of August, 1815, or that he had obtained a certificate to practice as such from the Apothecaries' Company. By the 6 Geo. 4, c. 133, s. 7, the common seal of the Company of the Apothecaries is deemed to be sufficient proof of the certificate, and that the person named therein is qualified to practise; but he submitted that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to go further, and to prove that the seal attached to the document was itself genuine and authentic. As far as the case went at present, it only appeared that the witnesses had seen and acted on copies of the same seal on other certificates, but that did not authenticate the seal in question as that of the corporation.

Byles, Serjt., and Keane contended that there was no necessity whatever for any proof at all. The mere production of the document, as the certificate required by law, and purporting to bear the seal of the company, was enough. In fact such a seal proved itself, as was enacted by the recent stat. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 113, the 1st section of which, after reciting that, "by many statutes, various certificates, official and public documents, documents and proceedings of corporations, and of joint stock and other companies, and certified copies of documents, bye-laws, entries in registers and other books, should be receivable in evidence of certain particulars in courts of justice, provided they be respectively authenticated in the manner prescribed by such statutes, and that the beneficial effect of those provisions had been found by experience to be greatly diminished by the difficulty of proving that the said documents were genuine, and that it was expedient to facilitate the admission in evidence of such and the like documents," proceeds to enact, "that whenever, by any Act now in force, or hereafter to be in force, any certificate, official or public document, or document or proceeding of any corporation, or joint-stock or other company, or any certified copy of any document, bye-law, entering in any register or other book, or of any other proceeding, shall be receivable in evidence of any particular in any court of justice, or before any legal tribunal, or either House of Parliament, or any committee of either House, or in any judicial proceeding, the same shall respectively be admitted in evidence, provided they respectively purport to be sealed or impressed with a stamp, or sealed and signed, or signed alone, as required, or impressed with a stamp, and signed as directed by the respective Acts made, or to be hereafter made, without any proof of the seal or stamp, where a seal or stamp is necessary, or of the signature, or of the official character of the person appearing to have signed the same, and without any further proof thereof, in every case in which the original record could have been received in evidence." The effect of this enactment was to do away with the very objection now before the Court; and it was therefore contended that no evidence at all was required to authenticate the document or the seal.

WILLIAMS, J.—That is so. This is the certificate of the Apothecaries' Company, and purports to bear the seal of that corporation. It therefore falls expressly within the letter and spirit both of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 113, s. 1, and requires no authentication of the seal. I shall receive it.

The case then went to the jury on the merits, and terminated in a verdict for the defendant for 84. 4s. 6d.

ESSEX SUMMER ASSIZES.

Thursday, July 16.

(Before PARKER, B.)

REG. v. ALLUM.

Quarter Sessions—6 & 6 Vict. c. 38.

The grand jury at Quarter Sessions may find a true bill for rape, although persons charged with such an offence are not now triable at Quarter Sessions. The person against whom an indictment is so returned may be tried upon that indictment at the Assizes.

In this case the prisoner had been committed by two justices of the peace to take his trial at the Easter Quarter Sessions, for assaulting Mary Brown, with intent to commit a rape. The clerk of the peace, after reading the depositions, at the Easter Quarter Sessions, sent before the grand jury an indictment for the full offence of "feloniously ravishing and carnally knowing" Mary Brown, and that indictment was presented by the grand jury as a true bill. By the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 38, it is enacted "that neither the justices of the peace acting in and for any county, riding, division, or liberty, nor the recorder of any borough shall, at any session of the peace, or at any adjournment thereof, try any person for any 'of certain offences,' among which rape is included. The prisoner was, therefore, not tried at the sessions, but was now tried upon the indictment then preferred against him, and was by the jury found "guilty of an assault, with intent to commit a rape," and was sentenced to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for the space of eighteen calendar months.

After the sentence, but during the assizes, Marsh, for the prisoner, applied to his lordship either to quash the indictment or to arrest the judgment. He submitted, in the first instance, that this application might be made at any time during the assizes.

PARKER, B.—As I may alter my sentence at any time before the conclusion of the assizes, I suppose it would not be too late to arrest the judgment.

Marsh.—Then it is submitted that all the proceedings are bad. Formerly the Court of Quarter Sessions had power to try cases of this description, and therefore, of course, indictments for such offences might be preferred, and bills found in their court; but they had not at that time any jurisdiction of perjury or forgery, and there are cases in which indictments found at sessions for those offences have been quashed. (R. v. Babin, 2 Str. 1088.) By the Act of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 38, rape would stand on the footing that perjury did under the old law.

PARKER, B.—In the cases of perjury or forgery, the Sessions had no jurisdiction to inquire at all about the matter. The question depends upon the words of the statute. [After referring to the statute.] I think it is very clear that the Sessions had authority to find the bill, although they had none to try it. I shall leave you to your forlorn hope of a writ of error.

Hawkins, for the prosecution.

REG. v. SALLOWS AND ANOTHER.

A B, a married woman, as she was walking along a road, found a purse lying in the road. Shortly afterwards, and before she had reached her destination, the prisoners met her and robbed her of the purse: Held, that the purse was rightly described in the indictment as the property of C B, C B being the husband of A B.

The prisoners were indicted for assaulting Sarah Folkes, the wife of James Folkes, and feloniously and violently stealing from her person one piece of the current gold coin of the realm called a half-sovereign, of the value of ten shillings, and one purse of the value of one penny, of the goods and chattels of the said James Folkes. In the second count, the property was described as "the goods and chattels of a certain person to the jurors aforesaid unknown."

It appeared that Sarah Folkes was the wife of James Folkes, and that upon the day mentioned in the indictment she was on her way to Colchester, along a road called the Morsey-road. About three miles from Colchester she found a cotton net purse lying in the road, containing a half-sovereign. When she had proceeded about half a mile further along the road, she met the two prisoners, who immediately attacked her, and dragged her violently into a field adjoining the road, and after considerable resistance succeeded in taking the purse and its contents from her bosom, where she had placed and was then carrying it. No evidence was given as to who the person was who had lost the purse, or to whom it and its contents originally belonged. In this state of the case,

Marsh, for the prisoners, objected that the property in the things stolen was incorrectly laid in the indictment, and that, therefore, there was no evidence for the jury. The purse at the time really belonged to the person who had lost it; but the wife, Sarah Folkes, had a special property in the purse and its contents, altogether independent of her husband, and good against every one but the individual who had actually lost it. The possession had never become that of the husband; the wife's special possession and property in what she had found was quite distinct from any possession of the husband, who had nothing to do with the matter. This was like the case of R. v. Radick, 9 C. & P. 237, where a servant who was sent by his master to receive money was robbed of the money on his return home. There it was held, that the money was improperly described as the money of the master.

PARKER, B.—The property is rightly laid in the first count. The possession of a married woman, under all circumstances, is the possession of her husband. If the circumstances are such as to constitute only that special kind of property to which reference has been made, it is still the special property, not of the wife, who can in law have nothing distinct from her husband, but of the husband himself.

Charnock, for the prosecution.

Verdict, guilty upon the first count.

REG. v. CONNOR.

1. To constitute the offence of arson at common law, the house set fire to must be a dwelling-house; and a common goal occupied by none but prisoners is not a dwelling-house for this purpose.

2. A common goal was kept in repair by rates levied upon the inhabitants of the liberty in and for which the goal was. S. S. the keeper of the goal, was appointed by the justices of the liberty. He did not reside at the goal, but kept the keys, and had the charge of it. He was also an inhabitant of the liberty, and liable to be rated for the repair of the goal: Held, that in an indictment under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 62, for setting fire to the goal, it should have been laid to be in the possession of S. S. but the intent of the prisoner should have been laid to be to injure the inhabitants of the liberty.

The prisoner was indicted for setting fire to the common goal of the liberty of Havering-atte-Bower, at Romford, in the county of Essex. It appeared that the goal was used at present only as a lock-up house, and that persons are never detained there more than a night or two, but are either discharged or conveyed to another goal. The liberty of Havering-atte-Bower is constituted by very ancient charters, and is under the government of a high steward and justices. The keeper of the goal is appointed and paid by the justices, and is at present Samuel Southey. He does not reside at the goal, nor is there any keeper's residence attached to it, but the keys are entrusted to his custody, and he has the charge of the prisoners. The court-house where the liberty sessions are held is under the same roof, but not otherwise connected with the goal. The goal is repaired by a rate upon the inhabitants, to which Samuel Southey is liable, as an inhabitant of the liberty. The indictment contained several counts. Some of them were framed under the recent Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 25, s. 7, for attempting to set fire, but as the evidence showed that the fire had actually taken hold of the building, the consideration of them became unnecessary. The second count was framed under 7 Wm. 4, and 1 Vict. c. 69, s. 3 (amended by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 69), and charged the prisoner with setting fire to "a certain house in the possession of Samuel Southey, with intent thereby to injure the said Samuel Southey." In the fourth count, the house was said to be in the possession of the inhabitants of the liberty of Havering-atte-Bower, and the intent to be to injure them. In the sixth count, for the words "the inhabitants," the words "Thomas Mashiter and others, justices of the peace," were substituted. In the 8th count, the house was described to be in the possession of certain persons to the jurors unknown, and the intent laid to injure the said persons to the jurors unknown. Other counts were framed at common law, varying from each other in the description in the property. The eighteenth, for instance, charged the prisoner with setting fire "to a certain house of and belonging to the inhabitants of the liberty of Havering-atte-Bower," without alleging any intent. The facts having been detailed in evidence, it appeared that the prisoner was a common soldier, who was being conveyed back to his regiment as a deserter, and was lodged for a night in the goal. The circumstances throwing suspicion upon him were proved, together with the other matters previously mentioned.

PARKER, B.—It appears to me that there is no count in the indictment which quite meets the case. The real intent must be taken to have been to injure the inhabitants, and the house or building itself was in the possession of Samuel Southey, the keeper. I am not, however, quite convinced that this is a house at all.

Marsh, for the prosecution.—A common goal, within the meaning of the statute, is as much a house as a palace would be. Then, this is a house in the possession of Samuel Southey, the gaoler, and he is a rated inhabitant of the liberty, and, therefore, would sustain some injury, however slight, from the destruction of the place. The prisoner is answerable for the natural effect of his actions.

PARKER, B.—The intent would be to injure off the rated inhabitants, not to injure Samuel Southey in particular. In the case of Res v. Donnan (2 H. Black. 682), it was held that a goal was a house within the meaning of the words "any house" in the statute 9 Geo. 1, c. 22; but there the goal's house was part of the goal, and the Court gave that as the reason for their decision. A goal is not a house at common law.

Marsh.—It is not necessary, under the statute, that the house should be a dwelling-house; any house will do. If it were, this house is the place in which the prisoners dwell; and whether they dwell there under compulsion or not would be immaterial.

PARKER, B.—According to that view, you should have called it the house of the prisoners. You have no count for that.

Marsh.—There is no case to show that at common law, to constitute the offence of arson, the house burnt must be a dwelling-house.

PARKER, B.—There is no case directly to that effect. Still, I have no doubt that at common law the word house, with reference to this offence, would mean a dwelling-house. That is fairly to be gathered from a comparison of all the cases on the subject. However, I will, if you please, take the opinion of the jury upon the second count, and reserve the points.

His lordship summed up the evidence upon the second count accordingly. Verdict—Not guilty.

SUMMARY.

THE Small Debts Bill has been read a second time in the Lords without a dissenting voice. It seems there are to be about fifty or sixty Judges, instead of ten or twelve, which would have been sufficient under the plan here proposed of a re-modelling of the Quarter Sessions Courts. The patronage is for the first appointment to be vested in the Lords Lieutenants of the counties, afterwards in the government. This is an extraordinary set of self-denial on the part of Ministers, for which nobody will thank them. The fight upon the Sugar Duties having come to nothing, the Session will be brought to an early close.

The Poor Removal Bill, after an animated discussion, and two divisions on certain clauses, was read a third time and passed on Thursday.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN LONDON.

FRIDAY, July 24.—Lord BROUGHAM said he had a petition to present from an individual, complaining of one of the greatest grievances that existed in what would otherwise be the pure and correct administration of justice in this country. He meant that of magistrates entertaining questions before them in which they had by law no more right to interfere than they would have to enter their lordships' houses and seize their property. This was a practice that formerly existed not only in the city of London, but in the city and liberties of Westminster, and in the borough of Southwark, until he had himself, when holding the Great Seal, called the attention of his noble friend Lord Melbourne, who was then Secretary of State for the Home Department, to it, as it was in his noble friend's department and not in his that the matter lay. At the time to which he alluded, he addressed a letter to his noble friend, stating the gross abuses that this system gave rise to, and calling upon him seriously to represent to the magistrates of Westminster—he having no power over those of London, who were corporate magistrates—the nature of these abuses, and the grievances to which they led. A person came up with a complaint before a magistrate, who heard the case in the absence of the parties accused. But, unfortunately, the complainant told the case not only for himself, but against the other. That case was heard by the magistrate, and not only by him, but by others who were present and among these others were persons who reported for the newspapers—reported very accurately, for aught he knew, though they were in the habit of sometimes throwing very absurd ridicule on the person seeking for justice, but that practice had, he believed, been now done away with. Now, the accusation thus made in the absence of the party accused, went in this way all over the country, although it might be really and actually without foundation. He would mention an instance of this kind, of what was called complaining to, and taking the advice of the city magistrates, instead of that of a lawyer or solicitor in his chamber. A noble lord, a friend of his, who had at one time held the highest situation under the Crown in this country, made an unfortunate marriage, and after his death his widow was reduced to great pecuniary want and distress. A pension was awarded for her support by the Crown, and two noblemen were appointed trustees for the purpose of administering it to her at the rate of forty shillings per week, as she had deemed such associations after the decease of her husband that it was impossible to interest her with the whole amount once. When she wanted an additional sum, she went to the city magistrates, and gave out a story that these two noble lords, instead of paying her the pension allowed her by the private munificence of his late Majesty George IV. kept it from her, and employed it for their own uses. The Lord Mayor, instead of saying "Go about your business, I have nothing to do with it," heard her whole story, and said, "Is it to be believed that this poor woman's consistent story can be true? Is it to be endured that those two noble lords, wallowing in wealth, should take this miserable pittance allowed to her from the bounty of the nation, and employ it for their own purposes?" The accusation then went abroad with the authority of the Lord Mayor of London against these two peers, and though it was so ridiculously absurd as apparently not to need contradiction, yet many persons believed it at the time, and he heard very lately that it was in one of the black lists against the House of Lords. In another case a charge was brought before the Lord Mayor against a noble duke for unjustly keeping a poor man out of a farm in the county of Northumberland, worth 150*l.* a year, and the Lord Mayor told the person, "Go to his grace and let him know my opinion upon his conduct." Instances of a similar kind formerly occurred in the city of Westminster, and in the borough of Southwark, as well as in the city of London; but his noble friend effectually put a stop to the evil by notifying to the magistrates that they would be struck out of the commission of the peace if they were again guilty of such conduct. Since 1832, consequently, the system was confined to the city of London, where it still went on. In the petition which he had now to present, the petitioner stated that he was on the 9th of March last brought before the Lord Mayor and another alderman on a charge of misdemeanor. After hearing the case, and without any authority whatever for so doing, they thought fit to adjudge him liable to a fine of 20*l.*, or if he could not or would not pay it, he was to be imprisoned and kept at hard labour for two months—a sentence which was utterly and absolutely illegal, as illegal, though not as enormous, as if they had ordered him to be hanged. The petitioner went on to state that his relatives, living at a distance from the metropolis, he was not immediately able to pay the fine, and he was imprisoned; but, at the suggestion of a friend, he had the matter brought before one of the judges of Westminster, who, on being made acquainted with the facts, ordered him to be set at liberty forthwith. This person could get no sort of compensation for the injury done him; and even if he brought an action, in consequence of the Lord Mayor having a jurisdiction in cases of misdemeanor to impose a fine up to 6*l.* he feared he could get no remedy. He hoped that her Majesty's government would be able to reform the jurisdiction of the police of the City of London, and place it on the same footing as it was at the west end of the town. He should say that these proceedings on the part of those corporators of the City of London were exceedingly hurtful, and tended very much to impede the administration of justice in its earliest branch.

SMALL DEBTS BILL.

TUESDAY, July 28.—The Lord Chancellor presented petitions from Barnsley, Halifax, St. Albans, and other places, in favour of the Bill for the more easy recovery of small debts. The noble and learned lord then moved the second reading of the Bill, and observed that measures to accomplish the same object had been before Parliament for a great number of years. The scheme of the present Bill had its origin in the report of the Common Law Commissioners of 1832. Two of the commissioners were the present Chief Baron and Mr. Justice Wightman, both of whom minutely examined the whole subject, and in an elaborate report they recommended the scheme which was embodied in the present Bill. It could not, therefore, have a higher authority. In 1838, a Bill was introduced into the House of Commons, who referred it to a select committee, by which the whole subject was again considered; the scheme recommended by the commissioners in 1832 was approved, and the Bill, as amended in committee, was adopted to their propositions. Pressure of other business prevented the Bill from being proceeded with in that session. In 1862 he himself introduced into their lordships' house a Bill founded upon the same principles, the progress of which was stopped on his being informed that the government of the day had a Bill of their own on the subject; and in June that year his noble and learned predecessor (Lord Lyndhurst) passed a measure which, with one variation, contained the identical propositions of his own. That Bill passed their lordships' house, and went down to the Commons, but in consequence of the pressure of business, he presumed, it was not further presented. In June of the present year the Bill to which he now called their lordships' attention was introduced by the noble duke, late the president of her Majesty's council; and upon examination, finding it correspond with the report of the commissioners of 1832, with the various bills brought in by successive governments, and knowing also how much such a measure was wanted by the country, knowing too that many applications for suits to establish local courts had been stopped by the expectation of a general measure, he had thought it his duty, notwithstanding the lateness of the session, to propose the present bill to their lordships. He would now shortly state the existing state of the law as to local courts, and what it was proposed to apply as a remedy. The county court was established so early as in the reign of Edward I. The amount of its jurisdiction was 40*l.* in those days no inconsiderable sum, and stated to be equal to 20*l.* of the present day. The original jurisdiction of the county courts had never been altered, but the expense of prosecutions in them had been largely increased, for the cost of recovering in them now a debt of 40*l.* often exceeded 6*l.* These courts, therefore, had entirely failed in the present day in their originally useful jurisdiction. There were many other courts for the recovery of small debts which had failed in the same manner. The necessity for some remedy had led to many applications to Parliament to establish courts where they might be found necessary. And unfortunately, at an early period, courts of conscience, or of requests, were established, over which there was no judge appointed competent to administer the law, but commissioners who were ignorant of the law, and not altogether unconnected with the suitors in those courts. Other courts had lately been established with a competent judge; and nothing could more distinctly shew the strong pressure for some jurisdiction of the kind than the number of private Acts obtained for the establishment of such tribunals. The local courts now in existence exceeded one hundred, and from the year 1801 up to the present time the Acts which had been applied for and obtained amounted to 146. As might naturally be expected, those applications had proceeded principally from the dense population of the manufacturing districts. The necessity of the case, therefore, was clear, and the question was how to apply a remedy. He had not been able to obtain the actual number of judges presiding over those several courts, because many of them were presided over by commissioners, and in some cases the same barrister presided as judge over several courts in the same district. It was quite obvious that throughout the country some local jurisdiction for the recovery of small debts was sought for; and, the county courts being found inadequate, there were only the superior courts to resort to. But those courts were even less applicable for the recovery of small debts. However useful they might be where the property was considerable, they were inadequate for small demands. In all the western Acts for the recovery of small debts, care had been taken to fix the amount of fees, so that there existed the means of recovery without any considerable cost. It was the evil of costs which it was the duty of Parliament to take the earliest opportunity to remedy. The scheme of the present bill, therefore, was to authorize the Queen in council to divide the country into districts, and to establish courts in those districts according to the wants of the inhabitants. To bring these courts within the reach of all who might have occasion to apply to them, there must be a large number of districts. He was not able to state the exact number, but it would be considerable. No man should have to go more than ten miles in order to obtain justice, which, of course, would necessarily make a considerable number of courts. But although it might be necessary to establish a considerable number of courts, it would not be requisite to have any comparatively great number of judges, because they would not be required to hold continued sittings in one court, and it would be quite enough in some districts to hold a court once a week, and in others once a fortnight. He should, therefore, have to suggest some amendments with this view when the bill went into committee. As the Bill stood, it would necessarily require a greater number of judges than according to the plan he should submit. He should propose that as these courts were to be established where they were required, according to the circumstances of the district, to appoint a judge who should sit alternately in all the different courts in the neighbourhood. He could not state to their lordships with any accuracy the number of judges which would be required by this mode of employing them, as it would depend upon the number of districts, and upon many peculiar circumstances. He had, however, reason to hope that it would not require more or many more than actually existed now. There were now between forty and fifty permanent judges, barristers properly qualified, presiding in these courts, and by employing them, as he proposed, he did not anticipate that any great additional number would be required. He proposed that the additional judges should be appointed, not by the lord-justices of the county, but either by the Lord Chancellor for the time being, or the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The mode of proceeding to be adopted under the Bill would be the same as that adopted under all the local Acts since the committee of 1832. Certain classes in it would re-enact the provisions of several Acts recently passed with reference to debts under 20*l.*; but in asking their lordships to pass the present Bill, he did not mean to say he approved of the law as it stood with regard to insolvency and bankruptcy. The noble and learned lord concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill. The Bill was then read the second time.

REDEMPTION OF SMALL TITHES.

TUESDAY, July 28.—The Lord Chancellor laid on the table a Bill to enable persons who had very small sums to pay or receive as tithes, to redeem them. The noble and learned lord stated that the Bill had been approved by the right rev. bench; and he believed it would be beneficial both to the clergy and the tithe payers. The Bill was read a first time; and the second reading was fixed for Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

COURTS OF WESTMINSTER HALL.

MONDAY, July 27.—Mr. J. S. WORTLEY wished to put a question of some importance in connection with the administration of justice in the courts of Westminster Hall. It was generally known that the practice in the Court of Common Pleas was confined to the serjeants, but during Earl Grey's government a warrant was issued by the Crown to open that court to all barristers. On argument before the Privy Council, it was however held that that warrant was insufficient without the intervention of Parliament. He believed that the late government had been prepared to introduce a measure for the purpose, and he apprehended he was correct in saying that it had the sanction of the late Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. He wished to be informed, therefore, whether her Majesty's present ministers entertained the same views and intentions?—The ATTORNEY-GENERAL replied that the present Secretary for the Home Department had found in his office a bill prepared for the purpose referred to, in order that the courts of Westminster should be opened to the whole Profession. He was happy to be able to state that such a measure was fully approved by the present government, and that he would undertake to introduce it, though of course he could not promise that it would be passed in the present session.

COURTS OF LAW (SCOTLAND.)

Mr. HUME understood that it would be more convenient for him to put the questions of which he had given notice, not to the First Lord of the Treasury, but to the Lord Advocate of Scotland. They were these:—1. If it be the intention of her Majesty's government to give effect to the recommendations contained in the special report made by the Royal Commissioners appointed by Lord Grey's government in 1833, and continued by that of Lord Melbourne until 1838, having instructions to inquire into and report to the House as to the efficiency of the courts of law in Scotland? 2. If it be the intention of the government to carry out, at an early period, the special report made by the above commission, pointing out the expediency of revising and improving the laws which regulate the transfer of mortgage of land and house property in Scotland? 3. If it be the intention of the government to take measures for improving the law and practice of jury trial in civil suits in Scotland?—The LORD ADVOCATE spoke in so low a tone that we only collected that he said in answer, that the noble lord at the head of the government would take the matter into his earliest consideration.

CHARITABLE TRUSTS BILL.

WEDNESDAY, July 29.—Mr. HUME, adhering to the declared intention of the government to legislate early in the next session upon this most important subject, withdrew his Bill, for the present session. He had a few amendments to propose, which he wished to lay before the house, and would propose to go into committee pro forma to insert them in the Bill for the information of the public.—The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he hoped the hon. gentleman would not pursue that course, because many gentlemen were absent who would have been present had they known that any step was to be taken with the Bill.—Mr. HUME had no hesitation to postpone the proceeding for a time.—Sir R. INGLIS strongly condemned the Bill, which he considered as one of a most inquisitorial nature, and one which would interfere with all existence of any kind whatsoever, from that which distributed and controlled thousands, down to the churchwardens, who, in virtue of his office, distributed 2*l.* in leaves to poor widows during the year of his office, and would include the universities, the Royal hospital, the charities belonging to the Church, and all those belonging to dissenting bodies. He moved that it be committed that day three months.—Sir G. GARTY understood that the Bill was to be postponed till the ensuing session. The government had the matter under consideration, and would be prepared early next session to state the course they intended to adopt. He trusted, therefore, the house would allow them to proceed with the other business which stood on the paper.—Mr. ESCOTT was very sorry that the Bill was opposed in so determined a manner because of its simplicity. He was sorry also that the most strenuous opposition to the Bill came from the representative of the University of Oxford; it looked bad, and appeared as if those he represented were afraid of being in daylight upon their transactions.—Sir G. GARTY again said that the government recognized the principle of accountability as applicable to all trustees of charitable trusts, but the whole question was under consideration; all he could say was, that, in his opinion, no measure would be perfect unless it carried out the principle of accountability.—After a few words from Lord H. Vane, Mr. R. Yorke, Mr. Henley, and Mr. Aglionby, Mr. Hume denied that he ever intended to include within the scope of the Bill any society supported by voluntary subscription. He only wanted an annual account of receipts and expenditure from all trustees of charities. He was satisfied with the promise of the government, and begged leave to withdraw the Bill.—Sir R. Peel thought, after the expression of feeling upon the part of the government upon the subject, the hon. gentleman had acted perfectly right. He begged to call the attention of the right hon. gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department to the necessity of having some uniform form of accounts, which all might follow.—He sincerely recognised the principle of accountability in its full integrity.—The Bill was then, by leave, withdrawn.

THURSDAY, July 30.—The Poor Removal Bill, after a long discussion and two divisions, was read a third time and passed.

PUBLICATION OF THE STATUTE LAW.

[A correspondent has forwarded the following facts and suggestions. The subject is one to which our attention has long been directed. We proposed a continuation of Chitty's Statutes as one of the publications of the Verulam Society. But out of the 750 members only 227 would take it, and that was not sufficient to pay the expenses.—ED. LAW T.]

Mr. Chitty, in the preface to his first selection of Statutes of Practical Utility (1820) says:—"The statutes before George the Third's reign did not constitute a fourth part of the present number. Since that time they have increased from six to twenty-five large quarto volumes. The evil is not a little enhanced by the purchaser being compelled to receive and pay for, not merely the Acts relating to England and Wales, but also those peculiar to Scotland and Ireland, and to local districts, and limited objects, together with those which have expired or been repealed."

At the end of only nine years, Mr. Chitty found the new statutes had increased to the extent of requiring an Appendix larger than the original work:

Eight years more have now elapsed, and the numerous body of practitioners and magistrates remain unsupplied with any further Appendix, or any new collection in lieu of that of Chitty.

It will surprise many of your readers to see a statement of the expense which must now be incurred to obtain the public statutes up to the present time.

They may be separated into two grand divisions; those before, and those after, the Union. There are Ruffhead's, Runninton's, and Tomlin's and Raithby's, in 18, 14, and 10 quarto volumes respectively; also Pickering's, and Tomlin's, and Raithby's, in 41 and 20 octavo volumes. Any of these may be had at moderate price, their bulk being their chief objection. But from the time of the Union to the present (with the exception of the selections hereafter to be mentioned) the lawyer's only resource is the editions in both cases put forth by the royal printers. And how formidable both in bulk and cost! The quarto edition occupies 17 volumes, and is charged at 52l. 6s. 6d.; the other extends to 42 volumes, and the cost 46l. 1s. 6d.!! These sums are as great as most commencing practitioners are in a condition to expend upon their whole library, considering that, from the very nature of legal lore, continual additions are inevitable.

But the handic essential to the actual use of these mighty collections, the royal printers do not condescend to supply. 6l. 6s. more must be bestowed upon Crabb's General Index, unless chance or favour puts the student in possession of the Index from 1801, printed by order of the House of Lords, not for sale; in which case, a copy of Raithby's Index for the statutes before the Union may be obtained at a small cost.

How large a portion of the printed mass above specified consists of the useless matter described by Mr. Chitty, may be estimated by the fact, that the mere enumeration of Acts wholly or partially repealed since 1800, occupies (at the rate of about a line and a half for each) 63 folio pages (H. L. Index.) Of these one half is before, the other subsequent to, the Union. (a) In addition to these are to be reckoned the Acts which have expired or been virtually repealed, together with those relating exclusively to Scotland, Ireland, or the Colonies, or to local districts and limited objects in England.

Since 1831, the royal printers have brought out a third annual impression of the current statutes, in royal 8vo. which edition is sold at about one half the price of the quarto. I believe it originated from a complaint made in Parliament, that the patentees would neither print a cheap edition themselves nor allow any one else to do so. The edition in question is nominally published in single numbers at 2d. each; no facilities, however, are given (but the contrary) to the purchase of any separate Acts that may be desired, or to the selection of such numbers out of the whole series as may suit the practitioner's purposes. The accommodation which the public really wants is the demio octavo edition, printed and sold in separate Acts.

To obviate in some degree the serious tax and incumbrance of either of the official editions of statutes, two selections have been brought out.

1. "A Collection of Statutes connected with the general Administration of the Law, with Notes," by Sir W. D. Evans, subsequently edited by Hammond, 8 vols. demio octavo, the 3rd edition, down to 1829, with two volumes added by T. P. Granger, bringing the series to 1835 inclusive. In this collection the Acts are distributed into classes, and are compactly printed in long primer type.

2nd. "A Collection of Statutes of practical utility, with Notes, intended as a Circuit and Court Companion," by J. Chitty; vol. I. in 2 parts, royal 8vo. pp. 1310, extending to 1828 inclusive. This work does not embrace the Criminal Law, the summary jurisdiction of justices of the peace, or matters of police or fiscal regulation; it was proposed to publish these in a separate volume. Vol. II. also in two parts, pp. 1368, appeared eight years subsequently, bringing the Acts down to 1837 inclusive. The original intention was so far deviated from (probably through the great number of new Acts), that the Criminal Law was still excluded, and the Acts relating to the office of justice of the peace were limited to those passed since 1828. The type of all the volumes is brevier, and the greatest practicable compactness is adopted.

To supply the desideratum of a new selection of Statutes of general utility, and to keep up the value of that selection for a certain number of years, I proceed to state a plan, which (as it appears to me) would suit both the publisher and the public.

Extent.—I judge that six volumes, each containing as much matter as one of Chitty's half volumes, would contain the whole. Five classes of subjects would be contained in as many volumes; the sixth volume would be miscellaneous. The Acts in each volume in chronological order. A general index would form a seventh volume.

Form and type.—I select the post quarto size (that of the Law Journal Reports), as it combines width of page with a height not greater than that of royal 8vo. The type to be the same as Chitty's, but the form of printing to be like Bagster's Comprehensive Bible, i. e. a two columns of text, with a narrow column of notes in the middle. This is the peculiarity of my plan:—the two columns of text are to be stereotyped, but the middle column, which is to contain references from the earlier to the later Acts, is to be set up in movable type. In the first impression of the work, this middle column would be very slightly occupied; but as additional Statutes are passed year by year, these would be printed annually, as supplements to the several volumes, and the references to them would be inserted in their proper places in the middle column, in connection with the former Acts which they respectively repeal or modify. By these means each annual impression of the work would practically be as complete, as if it were then brought out for the first time; and the sale of the work would of course be increasingly maintained. And as regards the purchaser of any particular impression, he would have the opportunity not only of adding to it the annual supplements, but of inserting with the pen the proper references to those supplements, without at all disfiguring the work.

General Index.—For this I propose to take as a foundation the Index prepared for the House of Lords, adding thereto such Acts before the Union as are still in force, and striking out all those which relate exclusively to Scotland, Ireland, and the Colonies; it might be convenient to retain those which concern local districts or limited objects in England. The width of page (as stereotyped) should be such as to allow subsequent Statutes to be indexed by means of a narrow side column of movable type. The purchaser of any particular impression, also having (as in the case of the text) the means of keeping his Index noted up to the latest period, by references inserted with the pen.

I am disposed to think that, upon this plan, the original set of stereotyped plates might continue in use for twelve or fifteen years, a period long enough to remunerate amply the publisher.

I had collected materials for a much more minute account of the existing editions of the Statutes, but what is above stated will suffice for the present.

I am, &c.

Summary.

THE promised opening of the Common Pleas is the legal event of the week. It was reported that this measure had been abandoned by the present government: that their predecessors had prepared a bill for the purpose, but that the representations of Chief Justice WILDE had induced them not to proceed with it. The report was, it seems, without foundation. The Small Debts Bill has been read a second time in the House of Lords, and there seems to be a determination to pass it this Session. The giving of the patronage at first to the Lords Lieutenants of the counties is a sop that will smooth opposition, and facilitate the passage of the Bill.

The sham lawyer's case at Devizes has been commented upon elsewhere.

A few judgments yet remain to be reported, and we have a heavy arrear of other matter, waiting room.

IN THE EQUITY, BANKRUPTCY, ECCLESIASTICAL, AND ADMIRALTY COURTS.

TRUST.

Investment.—What degree of care in the management of a trust fund will exonerate the trustee from the consequence of a breach of trust, in case of loss to the fund, must be determined according to the circumstances of each case; but it may be considered as a clear rule that any act, or series of acts, whereby the trustee substitutes other persons in the room of himself as guardians and trustees of the property, to exercise unlimited control over it, would be sufficient to make him responsible for any loss sustained by or through those persons. The trustee ought not to entrust any one with the trust property more than is absolutely necessary, even in the ordinary course of business. "Necessity," Lord Cottenham observes, "which includes the regular course of business, in administering the property, will, in equity, exonerate the personal representative, but if, without such necessity, he was instrumental in giving to the person failing possession of any part of the property, he will be liable." A striking illustration of the rule occurs in Mathew v. Brice, 7 Law T. 1, where Exchequer Bills had been left by a trustee in the hands of the brokers, who also acted to some extent in the capacity of bankers, pending a treaty for a mortgage, and had been sold by the brokers, who had applied the money to their own purpose; it was held, on failure of the brokers, that the trustee was liable to make good the loss to the trust estate.

Statute of Limitations.—The stat. 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 27, s. 40, enacts, "that no action, suit, or other proceeding, shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage, judgment, or lien charged upon, or payable out of, any land or rent, at law or in equity, or any legacy, but within twenty years next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued to some person or persons capable of giving a discharge or release for the same;" and it is held that the provision only applies to cases in which it is sought to recover any sum from a person claiming adversely, and not to the case of a trustee, his possession being the same as the possession of the cestuique trust; and accordingly, in Young v. Lord Waterpark, 6 Law T. 517, it was held, on appeal affirming the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor of England, that a term for 500 years which had been vested in trustees, to raise portions for younger children, was a subsisting trust for such of the children as had not received their portions, though upwards of twenty years had elapsed since the portions had become payable, and the claimants had been under no disability. And the Chancellor observed that the term was still in the trustees, and there was nothing in the statute to prevent them from raising the residue of the portions; and that the statute had no application to a case of this nature between a trustee and cestuique trust, for the trustee did not hold adversely to the cestuique trust, but for him and for his use and benefit.

Voluntary Assignments.—In cases of voluntary assignments of property, which do not deprive the assignor of all interest in the property, immediately on executing the conveyance, it seldom happens that all the necessary formalities are observed, so as to render the assignment complete. Cases of this sort generally occur where the assignor is desirous of settling property, so as to have a life interest in it himself, with remainder to persons whom he means to benefit; and in such cases the difficulty constantly to be met is the incompleteness of the assignment, so as to vest the property in the assignee without the assistance of the Court; for the Court will not take an active part for that purpose, though it will give effect to a perfect and complete assignment, or carry out the trusts of a voluntary deed, if properly disclosed. Accordingly, in Searle v. Law, 7 Law T. 78, A. L. by a voluntary deed assigned certain turnpike bonds and shares in public companies, to a trustee, upon trust for himself (A. L.) for life, as he should appoint; and in default of appointment, and after his death, upon trust, for his great nephew; and he then delivered the bonds and certificates to the trustee, but took no further step to complete the assignment, and died. The Master, in his report, certified, that certain formalities which had not been observed were requisite to completely effectuate the assignment; and it was held, that the great nephew took nothing, but that the personal representatives of A. L. were entitled to the property.

WILL.

Few questions of construction have arisen involving any new principle; the points raised on wills being chiefly in reference to the formalities required to be observed for validating them when made in the execution of a power, or the like.

Publications, &c.—By the Wills Act, 1 Vict. c. 26, publication of a will is now no longer necessary; but where it is one of the formalities required in the execution of a power to will, like every other prescribed formality, except attestation, it must be attended to. Accordingly, questions frequently arise, whether what has been done is in substance, or is equivalent to what is required by the terms of the power. A late case raised the question whether the words "We, the undersigned attest to have seen the above testator sign the above will," amounted to a sufficient attestation of publication of a will in exercise of a power which required the will "to be signed and published in the presence of," &c. And the Vice-Chancellor of England held, that it was. (Anon. 6 Law T. 362.)

Gifts inter vivos. Donatio mortis causa.—A very singular case may be noticed, under this head, of a gift of property, with a view to evade the legacy duty, and yet so made that the donor should retain his interest in the property during his life. The testator, two years before his death, put Dutch bonds and title-deeds of property in a tin box, on which he painted the name of the person in whose house he lived, and gave him the key thereof, but did not deliver the box itself till a short time before his death, when the testator's nurse delivered it. The property, according to a written paper on it, was for the landlord and his family, but they were not to have it till his death; and he stated, in a note to the landlord, that he gave it in the way he had done to avoid legacy duty, and recommended silence on the subject. This was held to be neither a trust nor gift, inter vivos, nor yet a donatio mortis causa, there being no complete delivery under an implied trust of returning it if the testator recovered. (Farquharson v. Cave, 6 Law T. 363.)

Legacy.—Portion.—No interest is payable on a legacy given to a person payable at a future time; but an exception to this rule exists in the case of a legacy by a parent to a child, in which case interest is given for maintenance of the child, on the principle that the parent did not mean to leave the child without the means of subsistence; but if the parent has provided for the maintenance of the child out of another fund, the rule is the same as in the case of a stranger, and no interest is allowed. (Donnan v. Needham, 7 Law T. 107.)

Revocation, power of.—Where a power of revocation is reserved to be exercised by "deed or writing," it has been decided, from Black v. Brown, 6 Law T. 412, that a revocation by will is a good exercise of the power. Before the Statute of Wills, 1 Vict. c. 20, the word "writing" included a will; and it is now decided that, since that Act, the meaning of the word is equally comprehensive.

Election.—The rule of law in Scotland, as is well known, is that a heritable bond has all the properties of real estate, and descends to the heir like real estate, and that too, notwithstanding the owner is a Scotchman domiciled in England, and may have taken the bond as a security for an English debt. In Allen v. Anderson, 6 Law T. 430, it was held that though the heir takes a beneficial interest in other parts of the testator's property under his will, he will not be put to his election in case of a heritable bond descending upon him, unless the testator has indicated an intention in his will to devise it.

Charge on real estate.—A question not unfrequently arises whether the effect of the will is such as to manifest an intention on the part of the testator to make his real estate liable to the payment of pecuniary legacies, in default of the personalty being sufficient. In the case of Cress v. Kennedyan, 6 Law T. 497, a testator gave certain legacies, payable after his wife's death, "when he charged his executors with payment thereof;" and he afterwards gave the residue of his real and personal estate to his executors; and it was held that the legacies were charged on the real estate.

Legacy.—Set-off.—Statute of Limitations.—The difference between the effect of the old and of the recent Statutes of Limitation is very material, for by the former only the remedy was taken away, but by the latter both the remedy is taken away and the right extinguished. Accordingly, though a simple contract debt is not recoverable after six years, nevertheless it is not extinguished, notwithstanding the legal obstacle to its recovery, but the remedy only is taken away; and if any circumstances exist through which the party having the claim can make the debt available to the estate entitled to the benefit of it, he is bound to avail himself of it. So that a debt due by a legatee to the testator, being part of the assets of the testator's estate, may, if not recoverable by reason of the statutory bar, be set off against his legacy, as a payment pro tanto. (Courtney v. Williams, 6 Law T. 517.)

Trust.—Precatory words occurring in a will in connection with a bequest often create great doubt as to how far they convert an otherwise absolute gift into a trust; but the leaning of the Courts is now against a trust in such cases, and the doctrine, which has been pressed to its full extent, will not be extended beyond the decided cases, because it commonly defeats the testator's intention. The authorities have settled that the word "recommend" in a will, when uncontrolled by the context, creates a trust; but in a late case, the Lord Chancellor, overruling the decision of the Court below, held that the recommendation superadded by the testator to an absolute gift to his wife, was a suggestion only, and not a binding trust. (White v. Briggs, 6 Law T. 477.)

LEGAL INTELLIGENCE.

REAL LAWYERS v. SHAM LAWYERS.
 The following discredited affair occurred at the recent assizes for Hampshire:—

Friday, July 24.
 (Before Mr. Justice ELLS.)
 Lewis Henry Osborne was indicted for having, by falsely pretending that one Mr. Warneford, an attorney-at-law, would appear to conduct a case before the magistrates at the petty sessions at Swindon, on the 11th of June, for and on behalf of James Stallard, obtained from him the sum of 12s. the property of James Stallard.
 Fitzgerald, for the prosecution.
 Smith, for the prisoner.

The evidence in this case is of so important a nature, that we give it in detail.
 James Stallard.—I live at Rodbourn Cheney. In May last I was summoned before the magistrates relative to my cottage, and I went to the prisoners and asked him if he was not a lawyer? He said he was not a lawyer, but that he was authorized as clerk to Mr. Warneford, who was a solicitor in London, and would give me advice. I gave him 2s. 6d. and he gave me advice; he said it was Mr. Warneford's money. I should not have given the money if I had not thought he was Mr. Warneford's clerk. I saw him again on the following Thursday, and he said, if I could pay Mr. Warneford's fees, Mr. Warneford would come from London and attend the court for me. He said the charge would be 12s. and I paid him that sum. He said Mr. Warneford would be sure to come down, and it was in consequence of that representation I paid him the money. Mr. Warneford never came down. I never saw Mr. Warneford. Cross-examined.—Nothing was said about returning the money. When the prisoner was before the magistrates on the summons, Mr. Brown, the attorney for the prosecution, insisted upon it that the prisoner should not be heard, and he was not heard.

J. W. Brown.—I am an attorney at Swindon. On Thursday, the 2nd of July, I saw the prisoner before the magistrates. He said he was clerk to Mr. Warneford, an attorney of Symond's-inn, London. I went to London and saw Mr. Warneford.

Richard Warneford.—I am an attorney, at 6, Symond's-inn, Chancery-lane. I am attorney to the Duke of Brunswick. I know the prisoner. He never was my clerk. I was introduced to the prisoner in March last by a barrister, as a client. I had an interview with him. He mentioned to me business he wished me to attend to, and stated that he had several friends at Swindon who required business to be done for them, if I thought proper to attend to it. I said I should be very happy to do it. On his return to Swindon he wrote letters to me, stating several cases on which he wished my advice. I answered the letters. Sometimes there were six or seven different matters in which he required my opinion. Among them was Stallard's case, and he very much wished me to attend before the magistrates upon it. I positively refused to attend, because I could not have gone down without a large fee, and because I did not consider it required my attendance. On the 21st of June the prisoner wrote to me requiring to know what fee I would take for coming down. On the 25th of June he wrote to me to say he had received 2l. for me. On the 14th of June he wrote to me hoping that I would not object to his being my clerk. I received 1l. from him relative to another case.

By the JUDGE.—I was concerned for a plaintiff, and I sent to the prisoner to tell him how the defendant in the most economical way, could get rid of his debts. In one letter the prisoner stated to me that he had received 2l. for me from Stallard. My fee for going to Swindon would have been 5l.; if the prisoner had said he had received 5l. for me I should have gone down. In a conversation I had with the prisoner, he said I should attend at Swindon once a week or ten days, and I said I should be very happy to attend. There were no terms for this attendance.

The following letter was then put in and read:—

"6, Symond's-inn, Chancery-lane,
March 28, 1846.

"My dear Sir,—I was not in town yesterday so as to be able to reply to your letter of the 25th, but which did not come to hand until yesterday. I am sorry to hear of the accident, and hope you are now quite recovered. I shall be very happy to enter upon business in the way proposed, and have no doubt that it will, by attention, be found to answer very well. The inclosed note was forwarded to Mr. Horry, but I have not seen him for some days. I think the plan of a small office at Swindon may be found a good one, and I shall be happy to hear that you have set about it. I shall be able to attend without any inconvenience at the times which you stated to me, and shall hope by my best endeavours to gain the confidence of your friends and the inhabitants in general, and to be of real service to them on all occasions when they may require professional assistance. Many persons near you must have known the late Colonel Warneford, for he farmed extensively, and was much respected in the neighbourhood of Highworth. He was the son of my father's eldest brother. I used to visit him, but since his death I have not been to Sevenhampton. The estates are limited under the Colonel's will to my brother's children, on the death of Lady Wetherell, without male issue, so that you see I am quite interested in your part of the world. I am rather in haste; therefore will only add, that I remain,

"Yours, very faithfully,

"R. WARNEFORD.

"To Mr. L. R. Osborne, Albert-street,

"Swindon, Wilts.

"Perhaps at Blunsden."

The next letter was as follows:—

"No. 6, Symond's-inn, Chancery-lane,

"May 28, 1846.

"Hoskins v. Ingram.

"Dear Sir,—I have received the order for the 1l. I now inclose affidavit of service for you to make and transmit to me, as from your letter I take for granted that the defendant will not appear, but will suffer judgment to be signed against him by default. You can tell him that his present best course is to make out a list of his debts and credits, in the doing of which I presume you can be to him of great service, stating in such list where the different creditors reside on whom it will be requisite that notice should be served. You are aware that persons who can give bail need not now be in prison more than a fortnight, so that they are enabled not only to continue their occupation, but also to make up their accounts at their own homes, which is often the most convenient plan in all respects; if however Mr. Ingram cannot give bail, I must take care to effect his discharge with as little delay as possible. I cannot at this moment say what the expenses may be. The charity fund for the relief of persons in prison averages the expense at 10l. which is what they allow on all occasions to proper applicants. It may be a little more or a little less, according to circumstances. He should also state fully the particulars of the different debts, and how they were incurred, and what for.

"I remain, dear Sir, yours truly,

"RICHARD WARNEFORD."

"Addressed, Mr. Osborne, Broad Blunsden, near Swindon, Wilts."

In another letter, dated July 1, 1846, Mr. Warneford wrote to the prisoner this sentence:—

"I congratulate you very much on your success in Stallard's matter, and hope it will have the effect of procuring you an increased number of friends."

The following are extracts from a letter written by Mr. Warneford to Mr. Brown (attorney for the prosecution), dated July 7, 1846:—

"Sir,—Mr. Osborne was introduced to me last March by Mr. Horry, the barrister, to whom he was formerly known professionally, and to whom he made proposals for business, which Mr. Horry, as a barrister, of course declined. He then asked Mr. Horry to name some attorney to whom he could safely recommend business, and Mr. Horry recommended me, who am his private attorney and solicitor."

"In his (Mr. Osborne's) last letter to me, which was on Saturday, he implores me to say that he had acted as my clerk. In one of my letters (a copy of which I happen to have preserved) I used these words,—'At present I do not wish you to regard yourself as my clerk. I have hitherto abstained from anything, as I thought, which might lead you to regard yourself in that light, and this because I wish before I have a clerk to ascertain how far there is any probability of business to employ one. I have no objection to do any business that may lie within the compass of your connections, for whom I see no reason why you should not act as a medium of communication, and any business—which your friends think proper to intrust to me, I shall be happy to do; but really at present I see no occasion for any clerk whatever. I cannot help your calling yourself my clerk, if you will do so; but I submit that your doing so cannot promote any good, either to me or to yourself.' I hope this letter will satisfactorily shew that I did not consider Mr. Osborne as my clerk. I shall be happy to attend when required as a duty, although these things are painful to me."

Mr. Justice ERLE here addressed the jury, stating that the question was, whether the prisoner represented himself as the clerk of Mr. Warneford, knowing that it was a falsehood, and whether he represented that Mr. Warneford would come from London, knowing that he would not do so. It was a question for them, but he certainly should not say but that the prisoner might have believed he was Mr. Warneford's clerk, and that he might have believed Mr. Warneford would have come down. If they were of that opinion, the case was at an end, but if they were not satisfied, the matter must proceed.

The jury said they should like to hear the whole case.

Mr. Warneford cross-examined.—I was engaged in an action brought by Greenaway. I employed the prisoner to serve the different notices for me, and to make the requisite affidavits. The plaintiff in that action employed me; the retainer was sent to me by the prisoner. I required a retainer. I have no doubt I sent down the form of a retainer to the prisoner. In the case of Pinniger and Bunce I gave an opinion through the intervention of the prisoner. The letters from the prisoner to me were similar to those I receive from any of my clerks at my own office when I am from home. My letters to the prisoner were such as a country solicitor would send to his London agents; that is as to the form. I expressed an intention of going to Swindon in April. The writ in Hoskins and Ingram was served by the prisoner. I was attorney for the plaintiff, and I gave instructions to the prisoner how to advise the defendant what steps to take. I have letters in London in which this case of Stallard is mentioned, but I did not think them material, and I thought I could relate all from memory.

Mr. Justice ERLE.—You ought to have known, Mr. Warneford, that the contents of letters cannot be given in evidence unless the letters are produced.

Witness.—The writ is indorsed with costs 3l.

The JUDGE.—Is not that 1l. more than you were entitled to charge?

Witness.—Yes, but I did not intend to take it.

The JUDGE.—But you charged it—why did you charge it?

Witness.—It would have been taken off upon taxation.

The JUDGE.—But an ignorant man would have paid you, and would not have gone to town to tax your bill.

Witness.—I have been in practice 25 years. If I could form a connection in the country I thought there was no harm in doing so. I never received more than 1l. from the prisoner. That was for the costs out of pocket for a writ. The actual costs out of pocket for a writ are 5s.

Mr. Justice ERLE.—What 300 per cent!

The Counsel.—Do you think that practice such as this would be adopted by a respectable solicitor?

Mr. Justice ERLE.—Surely you will not take Mr. Warneford's opinion upon that?

Witness.—I think it is.

The JUDGE.—Surely this sort of practice of keeping offices in the country by illiterate and unqualified persons, is not adopted by attorneys who have a respect for their character?

Witness.—I think it is. I see no harm in it at all. I keep only one office. I acted under the advice of Mr. Horry, the barrister. I have clients at Bridgewater and Leek in the same way, and I acted under the advice of a very respectable barrister.

The JUDGE.—But an attorney ought not to want advice of a barrister as to keeping an office. Did you not give the prisoner to understand you would attend at an office at Swindon?

Witness.—At first I did; but I never went there.

Counsel.—And I should think you never would.

Witness.—I shall not. I have had occasion to employ a man at Bridgewater to serve notices, &c. He is a schoolmaster. His name is Harbin. The person I employ at Leek is a farmer. I have acted entirely under Mr. Horry's advice with regard to the prisoner, and the Swindon office. I have never charged for advice in my life. I am only paid for letters.

The JUDGE.—Have you never received anything for advice without charging? will you swear that?

Witness.—I never have from Bridgewater or Leek. I have never asked for anything for advice in my life. I have received something as a gratuity. It is for instructions.

The JUDGE.—Then you do get something for instructions?

Witness.—I never charge unless the suit goes out. I pay my agents by the job. I have never paid the prisoner anything. I have paid Harbin at Bridgewater.

The JUDGE.—Have you ever given him some of your own money?

Witness.—I should say so.

The JUDGE.—My notion is that Harbin deducts it.

Witness.—No, he makes out a little bill. He never receives money for me. I mean to sue on that. I receive the debts and costs myself. I send the bill to the party, who sends me a post-office order for the amount. I do not give the parties who act for me at Bridgewater or Leek any salary. I pay them by the job, not a per centage. The amount here is paid through a friend.

The JUDGE.—What is the name of that friend.

Witness.—Am I obliged to tell?

The JUDGE.—Yes, you are.

Witness.—Then it is A. Heaneker, esq. the lord of the manor of Leek. I am his attorney, and the man who acts for me is one of his tenants. I have attended at Bridgewater and Leek. I should have paid the prisoner when I received money arising from his introductions, but I never did receive any money except the one pound. In the case of Hoskins and Ingram, the plaintiff has never received a farthing, and the action has not been proceeded with. Why, I do not know. I took money from the plaintiff to carry on the action, and from the defendant to take the benefit of the Insolvent Act.

Re-examined.—I heard something to the disadvantage of the prisoner, but I did not tell the prisoner. I abandoned my intention of going to Swindon in consequence of what I heard.

Smith then addressed the jury for the prisoner.

Mr. Justice ERLE, in summing up, said that it appeared to him that observations might be made upon the way in which this money had been obtained, but he would forbear making observations upon other persons while the fate of the prisoner was undecided. The question was, did the prisoner at the time he made these representations know that they were false representations? But he begged the jury not to let the consideration of the matter, being a most pernicious fraud, lead away their minds from the true question in the case.

The jury returned a verdict of Not Guilty.

Mr. Justice ERLE then addressed the prisoner.—I trust, Osborn, you will take care that you don't unite with other persons in representing that legal advice can be given in this way.

Fitzgerald then applied for all the letters to be impounded.

Mr. Justice ERLE said he thought, for the purpose of justice, that all documents which had been read should be detained until the parties had decided whether any steps should be taken.

WILL OF THE LATE CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—Probate of the will and codicil of the late Right Hon. Sir Nicolas Conyngham Tindal, Lord Chief Justice of her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, has been granted to his executors, Charles John Tindal, James Whatman Besanquet, and Daniel Smith Bockett, esqrs. The personal estate was valued at 45,000l. His will was made in September, 1842. He has devised certain freeholds at Cholmondeston and Aylesbury to his eldest surviving son, Louis Symonds Tindal, and his only other son, Charles John Tindal.

and has directed his executors and trustees to dispose of and convert into money the rest of his freeholds, with all manors and hereditaments, and all other estates, real, leasehold, or personal. He bequeaths to his daughter, Merelina, wife of the said J. W. Bosanquet, a legacy of 2,000*l.* having amply provided for her on her marriage; directs his executors to invest 8,000*l.* for the widow of his son Nicolas, and their two infant daughters, and has also made provision for other members of his family; has left legacies to his servants, and by his codicil, made in February last, leaves to his faithful housekeeper, who has been thirty years in his service, an annuity of 40*l.* The residue of his property of every description to be equally divided between his two sons. His lordship was in his 69th year.—Post.

CURIOUS WELSH CUSTOM.—One day last week a gallant captain who stands in a high position in the civil force of the adjoining county of Carmarthen, took a walk into a hayfield, where the haymakers were pursuing their avocations. No sooner had he entered the field, than, in accordance with the custom which generally prevails in some districts in Wales of giving every new visitor, of whatever class, age, or sex, an initiatory tumble in the hay, two women of Herculean strength seized the military man, and instantly laid him prostrate in dried and well-seasoned herbage. Being entirely ignorant of this custom of times, to which, as the lawyers say, the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, our hero naturally imagined that he was about being visited with summary and condign punishment for his former active interference for the suppression of the Rebecca disturbances. Having disengaged himself from the fangs of his amazonian assailants, he lost no time in procuring an authority for their apprehension. The case accordingly came on for hearing before the magistrates at Carmarthen. The complainant having detailed his grievance amidst the merriment of the audience, the magistrates, at the conclusion, became immoderately convulsed with laughter, one of their worship observing, that he had been himself served out in the same way fifty times. Case dismissed.

COURT OF CHANCERY.—Lord Lyndhurst, upon his retirement from office, had twelve judgments of appeals to deliver; eleven of these appeals he dismissed, i. e. confirmed the decision of the Court below, and one allowed. Lord Cottenham had delivered judgment in thirteen appeals, up to the 24th July, eleven of which he has allowed, and two only dismissed. This is a strange contrast, the appeals to both Chancellors being from the same judges.—Evening paper.

THE GRAND JURY SYSTEM.—At a Court of Aldermen of the City of London, held for the despatch of public business, Alderman Wood submitted the following motion to the Court:—

"That it be referred to the Committee for General Purposes to inquire into the present state of the administration of justice in the Central Criminal Court, as regards the existence of grand jurors, and to report to this court whether or not they can be safely dispensed with. And should the committee entertain the affirmative, that then they do report to the Court what substitute, if any, should be adopted, or what course would be best adapted to secure the trial of prisoners, and by what means such recommendation should be carried into effect."

Sir PETER LAURIE seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

RAILWAY DEPOSITS.—Sessional Paper, No. 208, contains returns to two orders. The first is a return of all the monies paid to the Court of Chancery in England, the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, under standing orders 33 and 39 A, on account of railway bills now before parliament; the second is a return of the aggregate amount paid to the account of the Accountant-General in Chancery, during the last session of parliament, on account of railway companies, with a statement of the portion invested in Exchequer Bills, and the sums charged as commission for sales and purchase; and similar returns for Scotland and Ireland. From the first return it appears:—That from the 10th of Jan. 1846, to the 6th of Feb. (inclusive), there was paid into the Court of Chancery, in England, on account of railways, 11,396,793*l.* 9*s.* 10*d.*; into the Court of Chancery, in Ireland, from 4th of December, 1845, to 6th February, 1846 (inclusive), 934,267*l.* 10*s.*; and into the Court of Exchequer, in Scotland, from 17th of January, 1846, to 5th of February (inclusive), 2,323,371*l.* 10*s.*; a total of 14,654,422*l.* 9*s.* 10*d.* The English deposits were paid in the names of 299 schemes; the Irish, in the names of 48; the Scotch, in the names of 94; a total of 441. The subjoined returns show that of 3,444,906*l.* 5*s.* paid into Chancery, in 1845, on account of railway companies, 113,018*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.* were invested in Stock, and 819,891*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.* in Exchequer Bills—rather less than a third of the whole; that of 337,819*l.* 10*s.* paid into the Court of Chancery in Ireland, not a penny was invested in Stock or Exchequer Bills, and that of 180,789*l.* 15*s.* paid into the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, the whole was paid into the Chartered Banks, and invested in Stock and Exchequer Bills.

CIVIL CONTINGENCIES.—An account of the sum expended under the head of civil contingencies in the year 1845; and an estimate of the amount required for 1846. The expenditure defrayed from the grant of civil contingencies in each of the three last years was as under:—

ARCHBISHOPS AND BISHOPS.—Returns of the gross and net incomes (in the years 1844 and 1845) of the Archbishops and bishops of England and Wales, whether arising from their archbishopricks and bishopricks, or from any other ecclesiastical preferment, or from any other lay or spiritual office held by them respectively, stating how much arises from each of such sources, and distinguishing all sums paid to or received from the ecclesiastical commissioners; also stating by how much such total income of each archbishop and bishop is greater or less than the incomes proposed in the preamble of the Act 6 & 7 Wm. 4, c. 77; of the name of each archbishop and bishop, and the date of their appointment to their respective sees. This return was moved for by Mr. Elphinstone, and is met by the intimation that it cannot be enforced. "The commissioners are only authorized by Act of Parliament to call for returns of episcopal incomes at the expiration of every seven years, and the last of such return was made to the end of the year 1843."

The order is however complied with, so far as it relates to the amounts paid to and received from each archbishop and bishop by the commissioners, which were in 1844 and 1845, as under:—

PORT OF LONDON.—A Parliamentary paper has been printed (procured by Mr. Hume), giving a good deal of information respecting the port of London. Returns are given as to the dues for harbour service for nine years, ending in 1844, in which year the receipts amounted to 13,207*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.* and the expenditure was 10,623*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.* The next branch gives the receipts in the same period (from 1836 to 1844) from fines or quit rents for permission to cut through the banks of the Thames, or to erect buildings, &c. below and above London-bridge. In 1844 the receipts were 1,657*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.* It appears, in relation to vessels, that in 1844 (returns are made for the period already mentioned) there entered the port of London 4,741 British vessels engaged in the foreign trade, the tonnage of which was 1,008,463, and 2,144 foreign vessels employed in the same trade, the tonnage of which was 353,346. In the coasting trade there were 9,816 colliers, with a tonnage of 1,783,683, and of other coasters, 12,922 vessels, with a tonnage of 1,106,713. Of steam-vessels, similarly employed, it seems that in the coasting trade 1,238, with a tonnage of 346,238, were entered as British in 1844, and in the foreign trade 634 British, with a tonnage of 145,470, and 125 foreign, with a tonnage of 34,961. In 1844 there were imported into the port of London (sea-borne coal) 2,507,709 tons of coal, the gross duty on which, at 1*s.* 1*d.* per ton, was 135,834*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.* and the net duty, 135,434*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.* Of coals brought landwise there were in that year 72,255 tons, the gross duty (1*s.* 1*d.* per ton) was 3,912*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* and the net duty, 3,832*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* Mr. Hume wished to know the quantity of ballast and rubbish raised from the bed of the river Thames in the nine years mentioned. It seems that of ballast 494,663 tons were raised below London-bridge in the year 1844.

THE MINT.—The Mint accounts for the year 1845 presented to Parliament, pursuant to the Act 7 Wm. 4, c. 9, have been printed. These accounts show, under twelve branches, the supplies remaining in the Mint of advances for the purchase of bullion for coinage; sales of coin, seigniorage arising therefrom; and repayments into the Exchequer on account of advances. The supplies remaining in the Mint on the 31st of December, 1844 (after deducting 18,410*l.* 10*s.* 7*d.* for uncurrent dollars unpaid), amounted to 228,443*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.* The sums issued out of the consolidated fund for the purchase of bullion in last year amounted to 850,000*l.* The purchase of silver, bullion, and dollars (including the sum mentioned as unpaid) came to 723,087*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.* The Mint value on the purchase value of 704,677*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.* was 774,350*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.* The loss on worn coin was 2,802*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.*, and the seigniorage (difference on the assay) was 72,475*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* The purchase of gold in silver ingots, and remitted by commissariat, was 17,740*l.* 15*s.* 4*d.* The old worn silver coin received from the Bank of England in the past year, and purchased for recoinage, came in nominal value to 23,900*l.* The Mint value was 21,097*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.*, and the loss on the purchase was 2,802*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.* The sum of 5,864*l.* 0*s.* 10*d.* was laid out in the purchase of fine silver bullion, for medals to be struck in commemoration of the success of her Majesty's arms in China. There were coined in the year, gold moneys in amount, 16,929*l.* 14*s.* 1*d.*; in silver, 647,658*l.*; and in copper, 6,944*l.* The payment for gold, silver, and copper moneys amounted to 754,021*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.* The repayment of advances out of the consolidated fund for the purchase of bullion was 678,772*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.*, and 60,761*l.* 12*s.* on account of seigniorage on the purchase of bullion, and excess by tale on the coinage, from the 30th of September, 1844, to the 30th September, 1845. The remaining three branches exhibit the debtor and creditor accounts of bullion and coin, coin and cash, and the Master of the Mint in account with her Majesty's Exchequer. The assets remaining in the Mint on the 31st of December last were 408,769*l.* 8*s.* 5*d.*

PORT OF LONDON.—Returns in continuation of those in the Appendix to the Report of the Committee of 1836, on the state of the port of London. The dues for harbour service upon ships which entered the port of London in 1844, amounted to 13,207*l.* the average of the three preceding years having been 13,180*l.* The expenditure in 1844 was 10,623*l.* the average of the three preceding years having been 8,441*l.* The receipts by the corporation of London, for permission to cut through the banks of the Thames below London-bridge, in 1844, amounted to 1,028*l.*; above, 629*l.*; both sums, particularly the former, exceeding the average of preceding years. The tonnage hauled in 1843 and 1844, exclusive of fishing-vessels, which are not required to enter and clear at the Custom-house, was as under:—

Foreign Trade:—	Tons.	Tons.
British Shipping	1,022,650	1,008,463
Foreign	295,121	353,346
Coasting Trade:—
Colliers	1,815,806	1,783,683
Other Coasters	1,085,466	1,106,713

The tonnage of steam-vessels entering the port, in the coasting trade, being all British, is stated at 327,992 tons for 1843, and 346,238 tons for 1844. In the foreign trade, there entered British steamers to the extent of 158,310 tons in 1843, and 145,470 tons in 1844.—The quantity of coals brought coastwise into London, in 1844, was 2,507,709 tons; in 1843, 2,730,534 tons; the quantity brought by land was 72,255 tons in 1844, and 34,593 tons in 1843. The net proceeds of the dues (1*s.* 1*d.* per ton) were in 1844, on sea-borne coals, 135,434*l.*, and on coals brought landwise, 3,832*l.* The quantity imported by sea has not materially increased during the last nine years; while that brought landwise has been steadily increasing from 1,199 tons in 1836, to 72,255 tons in 1844.—The number of tons of ballast and rubbish removed from the bed of the Thames, below London Bridge, by the Corporation's lighters, has for some years averaged nearly 500,000 per annum. The quantity which has been so removed above the bridge is comparatively small; and during the three years ending 1844 the return is "nil."

SHIPPING.—Mr. Wawn has procured a return of sailing vessels registered at each port of the United Kingdom, including the Isle of Man, &c. in 1845; of vessels entered and cleared coastwise in 1846; of number and tonnage of vessels registered at each of the ports of the colonies; of vessels built, registered, sold, wrecked, and broken up in 1845. These returns, comprised in one, extend to twelve printed pages. It appears that in England, Scotland, and Ireland, the sailing vessels registered on the 31st of December last numbered, under fifty tons, 6,216, and 10,953 above that tonnage; in England; the tonnage of the former was 182,429, and of the latter 2,093,409; in Scotland the number under fifty tons was 1,204, and above fifty tons, 2,187; the tonnage of the former was 38,114, and of the latter 434,618; in Ireland the number under fifty tons was 1,004, of which the tonnage was 28,312, whilst of 1,066 above fifty tons, the tonnage was 178,518. The vessels and tonnage of those of Guernsey, Jersey, and the Isle of Man, are given. There were of steam-vessels on the same day, 357 registered in England under fifty tons, and 337 above fifty tons; in Scotland thirty under and 109 above; and in Ireland eight under, and seventy-one above fifty tons. Of vessels that entered and cleared coastwise in the year ending the 31st of December last, there were in England 109,570 inwards, with a tonnage of 8,357,366; and outwards 122,763, with a tonnage of 9,136,731. Of steam-vessels in the same category there were 10,358 inwards, with a tonnage of 2,066,921; and 10,263 outwards, with a tonnage of 1,957,061. In Scotland the number of sailing vessels inwards was 19,680, the tonnage 1,185,507; and outwards 19,758, the tonnage 1,172,118. And of steam-vessels, 2,889 were entered inwards, with 748,674 tonnage; and 2,862 outwards, with a tonnage of 713,009. In Ireland, of sailing vessels there were 17,839 inwards, with a tonnage of 1,360,567; and 10,664 outwards, with a tonnage of 684,611; whilst of steam-vessels there were 3,653 entered inwards, and 3,797 outwards, of which the tonnage of the former was 923,021, and of the latter 866,121. The three next branches of the return show the number of vessels and tonnage to and from the colonies in the year, embracing several thousand ships, as well as those from and to foreign ports. A return is likewise given of the vessels entered at the colonies of the United Kingdom. These returns, which show the great commerce of the country, mention that 788 sailing and 65 steam-vessels were built and registered last year, and conclude with the information that 534 sailing and 5 steam-vessels were wrecked last year, and 81 sailing and 19 steam-vessels were broken up in that period.

PROCEEDINGS OF LAW SOCIETIES.

COMMITTEE ON EQUITY AND THE LAW OF PROPERTY.

The following reference was made to these committees:—

"To consider the system of uses and trusts as regards real property, with the view to its improvement."

THE FIRST REPORT.

In order to enable the society to form a correct opinion on the present reference, it will be necessary briefly to consider the changes which have from time to time been made in the law affecting it.

The actual livery and entry on the land attornment or matter of record, were one or other of them essential to every disposition of corporeal hereditaments at common law.

These were rendered necessary because all lands were held under circumstances which do not now exist. "Every manor (to use the words of a recent writer,) presented a little society of warriors and husbandmen combined for mutual defence and support. As such a league naturally required that a new and perhaps unfriendly associate should not be introduced without the privity of the lord and his existing tenant, livery on the transfer of the feud was a solemn installation, witnessed and sanctioned by the feudal body. As the same compact equally required that a strange lord should not be imposed upon the tenants against their will, attornment on the transfer of the seignory was the open adhesion of the vassals to their new chief."

Attornments and assurances of record have been practically abolished, and feoffments have of late been rare, and their peculiar effect as having what was called a terrible operation, or operating by wrong, that is, by disturbing the seisin, is taken away by an Act of the last session.

These assurances, therefore, for conveying an estate at common law can now be said hardly to exist for future purposes. But the peculiarities as to limitations of estates which arose out of the former circumstances to which we have alluded are still in force, and the question frequently arises, whether an estate operates at common law or in some other way. And this state of the law remains unaffected by the Act of last session already referred to. (8 & 9 Vict. c. 106.)

By that statute, sec. 2, it is enacted, that after the 1st of October, 1845, all corporeal hereditaments shall, as regards the conveyance of the immediate freehold thereof, be deemed to lie in grant as well as in livery. The grant will probably become henceforth the assurance most generally employed for the conveyance of all freehold hereditaments, as well corporeal as incorporeal, and all the fictitious devices to which conveyancers have been hitherto obliged to resort, to avoid the necessity of giving livery of seisin, and more especially the lease and release will become unnecessary. They are virtually superseded.

The grant, it should be observed, is a common law assurance. It is complete without any other ceremonies than those necessary to a deed, and the hereditaments conveyed by it pass by the mere execution and delivery of the deed. No peculiar words are necessary to its validity, not even the word "grant." The seisin to be acquired under it is a common law seisin, and estates under it, unless a grantee to uses be introduced, must take effect at the common law.

It is important, then, briefly to consider what estates may be limited at the common law. And it is to be remembered that where a use is declared to the same person as would take the estate at common law, such person will take by the common law. Thus on a limitation to A, to the use of A, A will take by the common law.

Let us see, then, what are the rules at common law which still exist, on some very simple and familiar matters, for it is only to these that we now wish to call attention.

An estate for years may be made to commence in futuro, but a lease for life cannot. No estate of freehold can at common law commence in futuro, because it cannot be created at common law without livery of seisin or corporeal possession of the land (2 Bla. Com. 144); but livery would pass an immediate interest. Livery of seisin, however, is not necessary to a lease for years, although for a thousand years. The lease vests no estate in the lessee, but only gives him a right of entry, and when he has actually entered, the estate is then vested in him, but he is not seised, he has only a possessory interest.

It is, then, essential to a conveyance at common law that it shall take immediate effect, or immediately on the determination of some preceding estate. The tenancy is not allowed to be vacant or in suspense for an instant, for if it were, the effect of the livery, which was made on the creation of the first estate, would be gone, and a new livery, or what is equivalent to it, must be made.

Again, by the common law, on the same principle, whenever either the whole fee or a particular estate in tail or fee life was limited, no condition or other quality could be annexed to this prior estate, which would have the double effect of defeating the estate and passing the land to a stranger; for as a reversion it was void, being an abridgment or defeasance of the estate first granted, and as a condition no one but the donor or his heirs could take advantage of the breach of it. Again, after a fee-simple once vested at the common law, there can be no remainder limited thereon; when the entirety is granted there can be no remainder, nor (which is, perhaps, the most important of all) can powers to persons with partial interest, far less to strangers, of revoking the estates limited and of creating new ones (which are now of such constant use in conveyancing), operate when reserved upon a legal estate at common law.

But so convenient were these rules as to limiting an estate at common law, that at an early period it was found necessary to evade them, and equitable interests under the name of uses (which it is supposed with great probability were first introduced to evade the statutes of Mortmain) were resorted to for this purpose. These equitable uses, up to a certain point, were turned into the legal estates by the Statute of Uses, and it is quite true that, by virtue of this statute, if rightly employed, the conveyancer is able to remedy all the inconveniences which we have mentioned. Under that statute, an estate of freehold may commence in futuro by a future use being turned into a legal estate. A conditional limitation which determines an estate on a given contingency for the benefit of a stranger, is valid. An estate equivalent to a remainder may be limited after the grant of a fee-simple under the name of a springing or shifting use, and powers either to persons having partial interests or to strangers, whereby uses may be revoked and new ones limited may be created. It is by the operation of the statute upon uses, and powers of the descriptions above adverted to, that some of the most familiar transactions in conveyancing are effected.

However, the Statute of Uses has been found to be a remedial measure of limited range, and has had very different effects from those which were contemplated by the legislature; it was the last of a series of attempts then made to amend the law of real property: the statute book proves that there had been several previous attempts within a very short period to legislate effectually in this matter, and the final effort (the Statute of Uses) failed in its great object, which was to make the cestui que use the real owner of the estate, through what Blackstone properly calls "the technical scruples of the judges." The legislature never afterwards made any further attempt to effect this purpose.

Owing to these scruples of the common law judges, there were equitable interests which were held to be unexecuted by the statute, and of which the parties in whose favour they were created would have derived no benefit, unless the Court of Chancery had interfered to secure it to them. Uses, therefore, under the name of trusts, were renewed. Cases of doubt arose as to whether a limitation was a legal estate, executed, as it was called, under the Statute of Uses, or an equitable interest, the right to which could only be enforced in the Court of Chancery.

Thus it has happened that, although much can be done by virtue of the Statute of Uses, the benefit to be obtained from it falls far short of the intention of the legislature and the necessity of the case; and, to prove this, it is here also necessary only to resort to the most familiar rules on the subject.

To illustrate what has been stated above—on the construction of the statute, it was held that no use could be limited on a use, and on a footmoot to A and his heirs to the use of B and his heirs, to the use or in trust for C and his heirs; the judges held that the statute executed only the first use in B and his heirs, and that the second use was a mere reality; "not adverting," says Blackstone, "that the instant the first use was executed in B he became seised to the use of C, which second use the statute might as well be permitted to execute, as it did the first, and so the legal estate might be instantaneously transmitted down through a hundred uses upon uses, till finally executed in the last cestui que use." It was, perhaps, still more absurd to hold that, when lands are limited to A to the use of A to the use of B, B takes no estate at common law. So again, where A bargains and sells for a pecuniary consideration to B, the legal estate, by force of the statute, passes to B, and the judges held, that if there was a further limitation to the use of C, C took nothing at all. Thus in construing common assurances different rules were introduced, and the intentions of parties were frequently defeated.

Again, the statute only mentions such persons as were seised to the use of others; this was held not to extend to existing terms of years, or other chattel interests, whereof the termor is not seised but only possessed; and therefore if a term of 1,000 years, already in existence, be assigned by the tenant to A to the use of B to the use of C, the statute does not execute the use.

Many other rules, showing the narrow construction of the Statute of Uses, might be mentioned. But it is sufficient to mention these to show that the object of the framers of the Statute of Uses, of uniting legal and equitable interests in land, have not been obtained, and that it has been left to a succeeding age to carry their intentions into effect.

Although the limitations to which we have adverted failed as uses, they were supported, as we have already mentioned, in courts of equity under the name of trusts. And thus it is that in very many deeds and wills we have some estates operating at common law, others operating by virtue of the Statute of Uses, and others operating in equity as trust estates. To determine in which of these three modes an estate operates is then always a question, and sometimes one of great nicety and difficulty.

The student and the practitioner have to bear in mind three several systems of law, and their respective effects and powers, which are frequently conflicting with each other. Now is this a matter of mere theoretical obstruction—it is frequently of great practical importance. Trust estates are not recognised at all in the courts of common law. But in bringing an action of ejectment, it is necessary to have the legal estate; and, in order to grant a valid lease, the legal estate must in most cases be in the lessor, and yet very frequently, and more especially in wills and deeds of an old date, it is very difficult indeed to determine in whom the legal estate is vested. The many cases in the books as to these points sufficiently prove this position.

Even if the practical difficulties as to this were much less formidable than they really are, it is conceived that the law on this point is needlessly perplexed and confused, that it is a source of doubt which should not, and need not, arise at all, and that it not only tends to confuse and bewilder the student, but has led, and may still lead, the practitioner into most serious difficulties and needless expense and delay, the chance of which has not been in this respect decreased by the recent statute.

It is impossible for the state to prevent the consequences arising from ignorance of the law. But it is one of its first duties to remove from the law all needless sources of doubt and difficulty. Neither are we without indications that the tendency of modern legislation and opinion is to get rid of these needless technicalities. The modern maxims of law wisely regard land as commercial property, and discountenance all undue restriction on its alienation.

The most eminent judges have deplored the present state of the law to which we have been adverting. As regards the meaning put upon the Statute of "many a time and oft" to encounter in the painful ordeal of the Masters' offices in order to establish the value of, and obtain their due reward for, past services. In many instances it may be that counsel confide for payment of their fees in the integrity of their professional clients, and of necessity in their integrity only, it being established that a counsel can maintain no action for his fees. (Davis, Pref. 22, 1 Chan. Rep. 38.) The recompense, therefore, to an English advocate appears to have been founded upon the principle which anciently regulated the positions of patron and client in the Roman judicature; and if we look further into it, we shall find it was one of the most distinguished characteristics of the compact between them, that they were never to accuse each other, which, perhaps, is to be understood in the sense that it gave the patron authority to compromise any matter in dispute affecting the client, even without his acquiescence and against his wishes; so that whatever might be the result or mismanagement of the suit with which the former might be intrusted, he should not afterwards be impugned for it in the form of a complaint. In short, the patron was considered in the light of having the care of the interest of his client and his child; yet with all the authority of the one and submission of the other, any deviation of either of them was deemed an offence as heinous as that of treason. This brings us to the question which has now arisen, involving as it does the right of counsel to make such compromise of a suit as he, in his sole discretion, may consider to be advantageous to his client under all the circumstances of the case. By the civil law a slave cannot make a compromise without the leave of his master, and with regard to compromises with us, it is said not to be allowed in marriage causes, in criminal affairs, or in state questions, nor in any thing where the public interest is more concerned than that of private individuals. In the present case, it appears that the course adopted in the settlement of the dispute between the Corporation and Citizens of London and the Watermen's Company does not come within the scope of any of those prohibited compromises. The power delegated to the eminent counsel which occasioned this discussion, then, must not be narrowed, or "cabin'd, cribb'd, bound down," by any inferior agency, which was the medium of his investiture of that power, for if so, it attacks that "sacred tie" of honour which is the bulwark of his condition. Nevertheless, it is not to be forgotten that counsel guilty of such compromise are punishable by the statute of Westm. 1, 3 Edw. 1, cap. 28, with imprisonment for a year and a day, and perpetual silence in the courts, a punishment said not to have been without instances of having been inflicted for gross misdemeanors in practice. (Raymond, 376.) It therefore appears unavailing and injurious to the honour of the Bar generally to indulge in public invective, unless the conduct complained of can be brought within the meaning of that statute.

"C. R. G." thus comments on the case of the Watermen's Company v. Corporation of London.

I am induced by the article in your last week's journal under this heading to offer a few observations on the subject, as a member of the fraternity so peculiarly affected by it; and I believe I shall only be stating the undivided opinion of ninety-nine out of every hundred solicitors in the kingdom in what I have to say.

I certainly have no objections (which you invite) to offer against the argument you hold as to the erroneous proceeding of Sir F. Theiger on the occasion alluded to (I mean of course professionally), viz. the undertaking, wholly against the wishes and instructions of his clients (as appears by a letter from them to you in the paragraph above-mentioned), to abandon the case entrusted to him; except, indeed, that you do not sufficiently deprecate such an impropriety.

No one will pretend for one moment to accuse that gentleman of improper motives, or want of zeal or energy in the interests of his clients, or to question his great ability to carry through any matters of business entrusted to him; but consider, Sir, for one moment what is the result of all this both to the solicitor and his client, and more, to the gentlemen of the bar themselves, for if the principle acted on by the learned gentleman be followed (and what is more likely, considering the authority whence it emanates?) what abuses might it not bring about, and what perversion of all right might it not generate? What satisfaction, I ask, is it for an attorney to say to his client, "Well, our case was clear enough, every thing in our favour; but Mr. Attorney-General would not listen to my entreaties to go on with the case." What is the consequence? In all probability the client ruses his attorney for neglect of his business. The least thing he expects is to lose his business for the future.

It must be recollected there is no remedy against a barrister for breach of professional duty. He, forsooth, may pocket a handsome fee, and go to Brighton for a month or two on the strength of it, leaving the cause to take care of itself, without the ghost of remonstrance being offered, or it appears he may gratify his clients with a view of his person in Court, only when there to act in direct opposition to their wishes and express instructions, aye, and his own previous advice too. This is too bad, and cannot be too severely reprobated. I am speaking generally, not from a view of this particular case.

I am fully aware of the very valuable and ready assistance of counsel in all cases, and of their high sense of honour and justice; but it is rather too much to pay a gentleman almost any thing his clerk chooses to name for his advice and assistance, only that, when the time arrives for acting upon that advice, he may pursue a course in direct opposition to the instructions framed in accordance with it, and which renders his clients liable to the serious consequences pointed out. I submit that such conduct is wholly beside the scope and meaning of the authority and responsibility submitted to counsel. If I am singular in my views, some of your numerous readers will no doubt correct me.

"Alpha" (of Birmingham) thus comments on "Conveyancing Reforms and the Registration of Deeds":—

Your correspondent of last week, "A Devonshire Attorney," touches the key-stone of our professional difficulties when he says, "I do not feel competent to originate, but I shall be happy to follow in, any course calculated to sustain our rights." This indeed lays open the true state of our case, that, with the fact plain before us that something must be done, there is no practical hand amongst us who will venture to originate of himself, or even to shew forth the good and the useful, as contradistinguished from the feeble and the mischievous, in the originations of others. Were it not so, who would have heard twice of so glaring a monstrosity as the scheme for compelling a registry in London of all deeds relating to property, however small, in every part of the kingdom, however remote? Surely a more complete embargo upon minor transactions could scarcely have been devised! Yet, whilst it is well known that these transactions (proving, as they do, the great mass, or, if I may so express it, the every-day routine of business in country offices)—whilst, I repeat, it is well known that these transactions are already borne down and incumbered beyond measure by a scale of stamp duties, so framed as to be little otherwise than absolutely villainous for its inequality and consequent injustice, and notwithstanding the fact that the proposed amendment is actually that each of these transactions shall now be blessed with the necessity, in the first instance, of searching at some registry office in London (perhaps 40, 80, 100, or 300 miles distant), and then, aptly, finishing off with a registration in the same office by means of a memorial, whereon 20s. duty would be payable, to say nothing of the additional 1l. or so for preparing memorial, and another additional 1l. for registering, besides agent's attendance, carriage, and portage, &c. &c.!!! Now, Sir, I would cut short such inventions as these by declaring at once that their author must be either a great fool or a great rogue, for I can really find no medium language adapted to such evil Genii. Why, in the name of goodness, if we must have a public registry, and if the latter be in itself (as, possibly, it might be), a great good, why not have one in every county at the least? Why this mockery and mummery of general benefit in taking every thing to the great metropolis? As if, forsooth, it could in any way benefit the furthestmost work in Northumberland to have the title-deeds of property therein registered at the greatest possible distance from Northumbrian ken! Besides, who shall ever know that he is safe, in trusting to a registry at such a distance? Between the time of search and your proposed registration, it is possible that half-a-dozen other instruments may be enrolled affecting the property in question, and then who, I pray, shall be answerable for the consequences?

Surely, then, if we are to have a registry at all, let each have it established as nearly as may be to the locality of his estate; let towns with a given amount of population have a registry to themselves, and at all events, let no one have to search at a greater distance than the centre of the county where his property may be situate; let the memorial stamp be repealed on all transactions not exceeding 500l.; let a short form of memorial be laid down so as to insure that it be inexpensive; nay, let the production of the deed itself render a memorial altogether needless; and let the fees for searching and registering, in minor cases, be limited at from 1s. to 5s.; and when this be done, perhaps the public will have cause to rejoice (whilst the profession will have nothing to regret) over the facility to be thus given in the passing and security of titles.

If by the foregoing observations, hastily thrown together, upon the impulse of your correspondent's remarks, I shall be deemed to have originated any thing worthy of his or the general approbation, I may, perhaps, be emboldened to try my hand at some other branch or branches of the contemplated reforms.

SHAM LAWYERS — PROFESSIONAL MALPRACTICES.

THE attention of the reader is directed to the report of a trial of one OSBORNE, at the late Wilts assizes, for practising as an attorney without being really such.

The fellow was acquitted, because he brought forward the attorney in whose name he had been practising. But the remarkable feature of this case is not so much the charge against the defendant as the evidence that was elicited in the course of the trial, especially from Mr. WARNEFORD, the solicitor who had lent his name to the prisoner, and who was the principal witness for the prosecution.

It will be unnecessary to repeat here the substance of those disclosures. They will be read with eager curiosity in the report. The system, of which a glimpse is thus afforded, is, we believe, much more widely spread than it is supposed to be. The offence is not rare of London attorneys permitting unqualified persons in the country to practise in their names, under pretence of being their clerks. How this is done appears by the evidence of Mr. WARNEFORD.

But what shall be said of his friend and adviser, Mr. HARRY, the barrister, who figures so prominently in this report. Enough has here transpired respecting him to make it necessary either that he should relieve himself promptly from the imputations thus publicly flung upon his professional reputation, or that they should be made the subject of investigation by those to whom is entrusted the duty of protecting the honour of the bar.

And as for Mr. WARNEFORD, he has confessed too much against himself to permit the matter to rest with the mere exposure of his doings. Unhappily, the Association by whom the work of protecting the respectability of the Profession had been undertaken, and accomplished with so much energy and ability during its brief existence, has perished for want of the necessary support from those who are always exclaiming that something ought to be done, but will do nothing when action is proposed. It is to be feared that from the proper guardian of the reputation of the Attorneys no help is to be looked for. But there cannot be two opinions as to what ought to be done in the case now under consideration.

More reproof and exposure are wasted upon such persons as those, whose conduct has called for these remarks. They are callous to censure; nothing less than the stringent hand of power will prevent a continuance of similar practices; and it is devoutly to be hoped that a severe example will be made of the offending parties.

And let not the tribe of Sham Lawyers flatter themselves that the acquittal of OSBORNE insures impunity to them. He escaped through very peculiar circumstances, such as might rarely again occur. Mr. Justice ERLE concluded with an emphatic warning to the tribe, which they would do well not to disregard. They may be assured that eyes are upon them everywhere, and that they will follow the fate of LAWSON, at Birmingham, if they continue their illegal practices.

THE COMMON PLEAS.

CONTRARY to a prevalent rumour, it has been announced in the House of Commons by the Attorney-General, that it is the intention of the present government to adopt a Bill, which had been prepared by their predecessors, for throwing open the Court of Common Pleas. Thus, supported by the two great parties, it may be deemed a settled matter. The propriety of this course has been apparent for a long time, and great practical inconveniences have arisen from the monopoly of the business of one of the Courts. The result, like that of all monopolies, was to diminish the demand, and thus ultimately to damage all the parties concerned. The business of the Common Pleas has been scarcely enough to prevent its law from getting rusty; yet can its bench boast of more ability than that of any other court. The first effect of opening the Common Pleas will be to cause a rush; everybody will be resorting thither, calculating on the small amount of business as securing early hearings. Thus the source of the advantage will be speedily removed; and it is probable that, for a time, this court may labour under the opposite evil of being overtasked. But such a mischief will be temporary only. The tendency of the business will be gradually to equalize itself among the courts, unless when a bench of remarkable strength happens for awhile to attract a setting of the tide towards itself.

Since the above was written, the Bill has been brought into the House of Commons by the Attorney-General, and was read a first time on Thursday night.

VERULAM REPORTS.

The Registration Appeal Cases, brought up from the last revision, are now completed in three numbers, forming Part II. of all the cases from the commencement to the present time may be had complete, in one double part, price 10s.; the cost of others for the same period being upwards of 2l.

It should be stated that this is the only series of Reports of Registration Appeals which contains all the cases decided down to the present time.

NECROLOGY.

JOHN TROTTER BROCKETT, ESQ. F.S.A.
OF NEWCASTLE, SOLICITOR.

Manibus date lilia plenis:
Purpureo spargam flores,
His saltem accumulata donis, et fangar inani Munera.

THE life of a country solicitor, engaged from "morn to dewy eve" in the round of professional duties, does not ordinarily afford those incidents which render biography entertaining and instructive. And yet we not unfrequently see, in the faculty of the law, men with minds so constituted that, in the midst of the most pressing engagements, they can find ease and relaxation in the simple change of study, and grasp intelligence on subjects which, to an ordinary observer, seem alien to what has not inaptly been termed "a legal mind." Mr. Brockett, the compiler of this glossary, was emphatically a lawyer—a diligent and painful student of the law—of great and extensive practice in it—and yet, as matters of amusement and relaxation, he grappled, but always with the hand of a master, with general literature, antiquities and lexicography—he brought numismatics under searching criticism—he sounded the depths of constitutional learning, and displayed an acquaintance with political science, which, in another walk of life, would have led to distinction.

Mr. Brockett was the eldest son of the late Mr. John Brockett, formerly of Witton Gilbert, and afterwards, for a long series of years, the Deputy Prothonotary of the local Courts of Record of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. On the family removing to Gateshead, which town was conveniently situated for the elder Mr. Brockett's residence, young Brockett was placed under the care of the Rev. William Turner, then the preceptor of a limited number of young gentlemen. His proficiency under this admirable teacher was most gratifying, and laid the foundation of a warm friendship between the master and the pupil, which closed only at death. The elder Mr. Brockett was a profound mathematician, and when his son was not engaged with Mr. Turner, he had him under his own care in the Prothonotary's office, studying with closeness and intense application the most exact of human sciences.

When the younger Mr. Brockett reached the proper age, he selected the law as the object of his pursuit, and was placed in the office of the late Mr. Carr, where he remained for a year or two, and then removed to the chambers of Messrs. Clayton and Brumell, at that time the principal solicitors in the North of England. I had been acquainted with Mr. Brockett since March, 1802, but it was not until he became a clerk to Mr. Carr, that a close intimacy was formed between us. The law, till then, had been a dry and barren field to me, and I had determined on forsaking it the moment I could have my articles cancelled. My friend suggested the propriety of our meeting on an evening in every week, after the labours of the day, and discoursing on law subjects only. We did so; we read—we disputed—we prepared pleadings, briefs, and assurances in supposed cases, the consequences of which was, the imparting of a taste for forensic subjects, and an impulse in the acquisition of legal knowledge, of which I yet feel the force, and experience the advantage. I have often seen Mr. B. at those meetings, wield the golden metwand of the law with admirable precision, and anticipate the status he was afterwards to take.

After Mr. Brockett had served his articles, he became managing clerk to Mr. Donkin, who was then rising into great eminence as a solicitor. Having spent a short time with Mr. Donkin, he was admitted an attorney, and practised as such for many years in Newcastle, with distinguished ability and success. In the early part of his professional career, he was extensively employed as an advocate in the Mayor's and Sheriff's Courts of Newcastle, then under the able presidency of the greatest of provincial lawyers, the late Mr. Hopper Williamson, and dealing with pleas, generally cognizable only in Westminster Hall. In the management of his causes, Mr. B. displayed that tact and discriminating judgment, aided by a manly and impressive eloquence, which, had he been called to the bar, would have secured to him the honours of the noble profession to which he belonged; but the turn of his mind was to tenures and conveyancing, and in both of those branches of recondite learning he excelled. No man could read an abstract with a clearer head, or with a sounder judgment than Mr. Brockett, and the conveyances which flowed from his pen, display a beauty, a compactness, and a harmony of parts, most delightful to the student of the Formularum Anglicanarum. But his highest praise as a professional man is, that his practice was marked by the strictest integrity and liberality, and that his numerous friends, with implicit confidence, committed their concerns to his guidance and direction.

When a very young man, Mr. Brockett took an active part in the affairs of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Newcastle, and in the various discussions that took place at the meetings of that body. The society soon appreciated his attainments, and placed him first on its committee of management, and then in the office of secretary, which situation he held until his death.

Mr. Brockett's passion for antiquities was excited by a friend presenting him with some duplicate coins, and he became, in consequence, a member of the local Society of Antiquaries, almost, if not quite, from its very commencement, and, for many years previously to his death, a member of the council of that body, and one of the most intelligent and best informed of the gentlemen who assembled at the meetings of the society.

Dr. Dibdin, in his "Northern Tour," very justly states that Mr. Brockett "may be considered the father of the Typographical Society established at Newcastle: his hints on the propriety of establishing such a society having appeared in 1818—a short tract of six pages." But he was not only the father of that society, but one of the principal contributors to the splendid series of tracts issued from its press—a series which has raised the typographical character of the town to a first-rate eminence in the Republic of Letters.

He translated and published, in connection with this society, Beauvais' celebrated "Essay on the Means of distinguishing Antique from Counterfeit Coins and Medals," to which he added many important notes and illustrations. Mr. Martin, in his Bibliographical Catalogue of privately-printed Books, has enumerated this and several others of Mr. B.'s beautiful productions. But the works by which he was most distinguished, are his "Enquiry into the Question whether the Freeholders of Newcastle-upon-Tyne are entitled to vote for Members of Parliament for the County of Northumberland," and his "Glossary of North Country Words." The first of those publications, replete with constitutional and antiquarian lore, received the high commendations of Mr. Hopper Williamson and other lawyers, and the latter is appreciated wherever the English language is known. Mr. B. had, at the time of his death, made considerable preparations for a third edition of the Glossary, and his only surviving son, Mr. William Edward Brockett, with filial piety for the memory of his lamented father, and to satisfy the demand of the public for a new edition of the work, has brought the present edition through the press, availing himself of the kindly literary aid of Sir Cuthbert Sharpe; George Taylor, esq. of Witton-le-Wear; Francis Mewburn, esq. of Darlington; the Rev. Dr. Darnell, of Stanhope; Mr. John Turner, of Newcastle, and other respected friends of his late father, who have taken a lively interest in making the work as perfect as possible. But the general diffusion of education tends to make the English nation "of one language and of one speech;" and the time seems not to be far distant when the North Country words, which Mr. Brockett has collected with so much care, will, in the strictest sense of the term, be Archaisms even in Northumberland.

The health of Mr. Brockett, for the last twenty-five years of his life, was such as to preclude his going much into company, but he spent such portions of his time as he could spare from the laborious duties of his profession, in those literary and scientific pursuits, for which he had so very refined a taste and ability. He formed a splendid Cabinet of Coins and Medals, which, after a sale in June, 1823, of ten days' continuance, by Mr. Sotheby, of London, realized 1,760*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* His library of scarce and curious books in the December following, was sold by the same gentleman. The sale continued fourteen days, and realized 4,260*l.* Mr. Brockett had a small collection of prints and portraits, which was, with that of the late Dr. Whittaker, the historian, sold by Mr. Sotheby in January, 1824, and realized 60*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* A catalogue of the books, with the prices realized, was published, and is still referred to, as an authority for the value of the works comprised in it.* At those sales Mr. Brockett had the gratification of seeing the most gifted men of the day in competition for the beautiful works which he had displayed so much judgment in collecting. But he was not a bare collector. He knew the value of his books, in the intelligence and wisdom treasured in their pages, and the use of his coins and medals, for the illustration and confirmation of history.

Immediately after those sales, Mr. Brockett started de novo in his favourite pursuit of collecting. And he made such rapid progress in this delightful work, that when Dr. Dibdin visited him in 1837, the learned author of the Bibliographical Decameron seems to have been astonished at what he saw and heard at Mr. Brockett's house. The greatest of bibliomane thus expresses himself, "In fact, the zeal, activity, and anxiety of my friend, in all matters relating to the literary, scientific, and antiquarian welfare of his native (adopted) town, have no limits and know no diminution. They rise up and lie down with him. One thing particularly struck me, in his closely-wedged miscellaneous collection—the choice and nicety of each article:—A golden Nero, or a first Walton's Angler, was as well nigh perfect as it might be; and his Horsley was only equalled by his Hock." In another part of his book, Dr. Dibdin gives the reader the following graphic sketch of his visits to Mr. Brockett:—"More than once or twice was the hospitable table of my friend, John Trotter Brockett, esq., spread to receive me. He lives comparatively in a nut-shell—but what a kernel! Pictures, books, curiosities, medals, coins—of precious value—bespeak his discriminating eye and his liberal heart. You may revel here from sunrise to sunset, and fancy the domains interminable. Do not suppose that a stated room or rooms are only appropriated to his books; they are 'up-stairs, down-stairs, and in any lady's chamber.' They spread all over the house—tendrils of pliant curve and perennial verdure. For its size, if I except those of one or two Bannatyners, I am not sure whether this be not about the choicest collection of books which I saw on my tour. Mr. Brockett is justly proud of his Horsley;—he opened it with evident satisfaction. They are all at Newcastle necessarily Horsley-mad. I suffered him to enjoy his short-lived triumph. His copy was upon small paper: of most enviable size and condition. Were you ever at Belvoir Castle?" observed I.—"Never," replied he. "Then take care never to visit it; for there is a copy upon large paper such as eyes never beheld. Having seen and caressed it, you will throw this into the Tyne." "I shall take care to avoid Belvoir Castle," was my friend's reply.

"Mr. Brockett may justly boast of a superb series of Roman gold coins, from Julius Cæsar to Michael VIII. Paleologus; and although his collection does not comprise every known variety, it contains all the specimens of any rarity and interest. What renders it more peculiarly valuable is the exquisite state of preservation of the whole. But here are also British gold and silver coins, of our Henrys and Edwards, and medals which illustrate in particular the local history of Newcastle. Nor is my friend a mere collector of these things. The numismatic blood tingles in his veins: he is deeply read in numismatic lore; at times evincing the taste of Eckhel, and the learning of Bœsch."

It only remains for me to state, that in domestic life, Mr. Brockett was a pattern of all that was amiable. His family participated with him in his favourite studies and pursuits, and his home was the abode of peace and happiness. Some years previously to his death, he lost his eldest son, when that son's genius was streaming forth in every direction, and indicating a career of no ordinary character. He sustained the shock with surprising fortitude, but it may have been the remote cause of his death, which occurred on the 12th of October, 1842, when our lamented Glossographer was only in the 54th year of his age. At the time of his death, Mr. B. was F.S.A. London, and, as I have already stated, of the Council of the Society of Antiquaries, and Secretary of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. The Council of the Society of Antiquaries, and the Committee of the Literary and Philosophical Society, followed the remains of their old friend and associate to their resting-place, whilst his pall was borne by Dr. Headlam, Mr. Adamson, and other friends, who had enjoyed a closer intimacy with the eminently-talented and honoured individual, whose loss was so generally deplored.

NOTICES OF NEW LAW BOOKS.

A Treatise on Copyhold, Customary Freehold, and Ancient Demesne Tenure, with the Jurisdiction of Courts Baron and Courts Leet, &c. &c. By JOHN SCRIVEN, Serjeant-at-Law. The Fourth Edition, embracing all the Authorities to the present period. By HENRY STALMAN, Esq. of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. In two vols. London: Butterworth.

From the time of its first publication, Scriven on Copyholds has been a standard book—the recognised authority upon the subject of which it treats. The name is familiar to every lawyer, the work itself to most lawyers. Every student who desires to master his profession adopts this as a part of his course of reading. Every practitioner whose business is in any manner connected with real property law places it in his library. Commentary on such a work would, therefore, be impertinent.

But our purpose in this department of the LAW TIMES is, in truth, not so much criticism as description. Unlike books of general literature, a law-book could only be criticised properly by one who is better acquainted with the subject than the author. Such competent reviewers are not to be found, and without pretending to accomplish what we could not possibly perform, we have limited our labours to the humbler but more really useful task of preserving a sort of record of the progress of legal literature, as a portion of the intelligence in which our readers have a peculiar interest. In the accomplishment of this duty, our aim has been to give such an account of law-books, or their appearance, as shall enable the practitioner to form his own judgment whether the volume under notice be in its subject and mode of treatment adapted to his requirements. To this end the course pursued is to describe faithfully the plan of the work (if a new one); its divisions and subdivisions; its completeness for reference in its Tables of Cases and Contents, and the conspicuousness of its Index; and then to exhibit the writer's manner by extracts which are selected with the double purpose of displaying the author and instructing the reader. When the book under notice is not a new one, but only a new edition, our duty is, necessarily, more limited; for, in such case, we have not to describe the plan and structure of the work, as far as the author's original form remains, but only to state what are the improvements introduced.

We take this present opportunity to explain the design of this department of the LAW TIMES, because some misunderstanding has occurred in some quarters with respect to the office here undertaken. As this was not unlikely to have been occasioned by the title formerly given to it, we have changed it for one more accurately descriptive of the design; and this explanation will, we trust, render any further reference to it unnecessary.

Mr. STALMAN, the editor of the present edition of Scriven, has effected very considerable improvements, by the application of great industry, guided by sound judgment. The reader is probably aware that Mr. SCRIVEN published a supplement in 1842, embracing all the authorities and statutes bearing upon his subject since the appearance of the third edition, together with some additional precedents. This the editor has incorporated, bringing down the cases and statutes to the present time.

It may be thought, by some readers, that with a statute for the enfranchisement of copyholds, a knowledge of the Law of Copyhold will be of less and less practical service every year. They will be surprised to learn that this Law, as it was promulgated, has been virtually a dead letter. Commissioners have been appointed, and all the machinery has been provided, and but one solitary instance has occurred of the adoption of the statute! The probable cause assigned for this by Mr. STALMAN is, that copyhold tenants require not commutation, which perpetuates, but enfranchisement, which extinguishes the tenure. We should be inclined from experience to say that the true cause of the failure of the Copyhold Enfranchisement Act is, that its provisions are not compulsory. On such a subject it is scarcely possible to find landlord and tenant agreeing. The Legislature must deal with copyholds as with tithes—enforce enfranchisement on terms to be arranged by the commissioners, with an option to the tenant to pay the commutation in the form of a rent-charge, redeemable on payment of a fixed sum.

The edition before us is an extremely handsome one. The labour that has been bestowed upon the successive editions, accumulating all the learning that continued research and new decisions could supply, is best shown by the Table of Cases prefixed, which alone occupies no less than seventy pages in double columns.

Another valuable feature of this treatise is an Appendix, containing rules for holding customary courts, courts baron and courts leet, forms of copy rolls, depositions, and copyhold assurances.

Had this been a first instead of a fourth edition, we should have been tempted to have extracted largely from its valuable contents; but the rule that restricts extract to new works must not be violated except under very special circumstances, as when the book is not so well known as it ought to be. In this case the name of SCRIVEN is as familiar as that of the subject the author has made his own.

A PRACTICAL COMMENTARY

ON

By WILLIAM HUGHES, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

Thus stood the law, previously to the Operation Statute, 1 Vict. c. 26, and so it still remains with respect to wills made previously to that period;

* The late Earl of Durham, then John George Lambton, esq. purchased some of the brightest gems in the collection:—The following is a list of them, with the prices at which they were sold. They now constitute part of the library of Lambton Castle:—

Gardner's England's Grievance, 1656, 20*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*
Garland's (Right Choice and Merrie Collection of), made by William Garret, 6 vols. 10*l.* 10*s.*
Glossary of North Country Words, an Original Manuscript, compiled by Mr. Brockett, 8*l.* 2*s.*

Mr. Lambton was much disappointed at this sale, in not buying the splendid copy of Bourne's History of Newcastle, on large paper, and illustrated with numerous drawings and prints, which was purchased by Mr. Jupp for 54*l.* 12*s.*

but with respect to those made subsequently, the 29th section of the Act has thrown considerable doubt upon the matter. That section enacts, "that in any devise or bequest of any real or personal estate, the words, 'die without issue,' or 'die without leaving issue,' or 'have no issue,' or any other words which may import either a want or failure of issue, of any person in his lifetime, or at the time of his death, or an indefinite failure of his issue, shall be construed to mean a want or failure of issue, in the lifetime or at the time of the death of such person, and not an indefinite failure of his issue, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will, by reason of such person having a prior estate tail, or a preceding gift, being without any implication arising from such words, a limitation of an estate tail, to such person, or issue otherwise. Provided that this Act shall not extend to cases where such words as aforesaid import, if no issue described in a preceding gift shall be born, or if there shall be no issue who shall live to attain the age, or otherwise answer the description required for obtaining a vested estate by a preceding gift to such issue."

Construction of the New Will Act upon the terms "dying without issue," &c.—Now, as the above-mentioned Act confines the import of the terms "dying without issue" to the death of the party, it seems to follow, upon the authority of the cases in which the dying without issue has been construed to relate to that period (Pelle v. Brown, Cro. Jac. 590; S. C. 1 Eq. Ca. Abr. 187; Hanbury v. Cockerell, 1 Roll. Abr. 835, pl. 4; Porter v. Bradley, 5 T. R. 143; Doe dem. Barnfield v. Wetton, 3 Bos. & Pull. 324; Sheers v. Jeffery, 7 T. R. 589; Eastman v. Baker, 1 Taunt. 174; Doe dem. Smith v. Webber, 1 B. & A. 713; Doe dem. King v. Frost, 3 ib. 546; Glover v. Menckton, 3 Bng. 13; Goldin v. Lakeman, 2 B. & Ad. 30; Stevenson v. Glover, C. P. Apr. 1845); that if the preceding words of limitation were sufficient to pass the fee, a limitation over in default of issue would not, as to wills made subsequently to the operation of the Act now under discussion (31st Dec. 1837), extend to an estate tail but an estate in fee-simple, subject to a limitation over by way of executory devise. (Stevenson v. Glover, C. P. Apr. 23, 1845). But where the limitation over is in default of issue, where the devise has an estate for life limited in express terms, it becomes a far more doubtful matter. It appears from the words of the Act that under a limitation to one for life, and if he should die without issue then over, the first devisee will only take a life estate; although, as the law stood previously, he could have taken an estate tail by implication, in consequence of the limitation over in case of his dying without issue. Now the saving clause of the section above alluded to will not permit an implication arising from the words, "dying without issue," to be construed as an indefinite failure of issue, and by thus restricting the limitation over the first devisee would, it seems, take a mere life interest, and no more. (Walter v. Drew, Com. 372). Assuming, therefore, that the first devisee takes only a life estate, are his issue to take any thing? And if so, what? It should seem that they would take, and in fee-simple. There appears to be quite enough to raise an estate in them by implication. A limitation to the issue of A, where they took as a class as purchasers, would even before the Act have given to every single individual answering that description a life interest (Cook v. Cook, 2 Vern. 545); and as by the 28th section, a devise without any words of limitation, will pass the fee, the life interest they would formerly have taken, will, by the Act now under discussion, be extended to an estate in fee-simple, which it seems the issue would take per capita as joint tenants, upon the long established principle, that where an estate is given to a plurality of persons without adding any restrictive, exclusive, or explanatory words, it makes them immediately joint tenants (2 Bla. Com. 180.) But where lands are simply devised to A with a limitation over to B in case he shall die without issue, there seems to be no doubt but that A will take an estate in fee-simple subject to a limitation over to B by way of executory devise in case A should leave no issue at his death.

As to a limitation over after a dying without heirs generally.—It may be proper to observe that the new Will Act is silent upon the subject of a dying without heirs generally, which, being an event beyond what the law permits for the vesting of an executory devise, would be void for remoteness.

The only exception to this rule is where the person to whom the limitation over is made, is a relation of and capable of being the collateral heir of the first devisee, for then the first devisee would be construed to take an estate tail only, and the limitation over would be good; because the latter limitation plainly denotes that only lineal heirs could have been intended, as the first devisee could not have died without heirs as long as the remainderman or any of his lineal heirs existed. (Morgan and Wife v. Griffith, Cow. 224; Tyte v. Willis, Ca. temp. Talb. 1; Brice v. Smith, Willes 1; and see Preston dem. Eagle v. Funnell, ib. 164.) But to have this operation the person to whom the estate was limited over must not only be a relation, but also a relation of that character as could have inherited from the first taker (Attorney-General v. Gill, 2 P. Wms. 369); consequently, prior to the late statute, 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 106, if the person to whom the lands were devised over had been of the half blood to the first devisee, and, as such, incapable of inheriting it, must have been considered in the same light as a devise over to a stranger. (Tilbury v. Barbat, 3 Atk. 617; 1 Ves. 89); consequently, the first taker would have taken a fee-simple absolute, and the limitation over would have failed for remoteness. These cases also afford an example in support of the proposition I have before alluded to, that the same words will have a different operation when applicable to persons standing in a particular degree of relationship to each other, than they would when applied to strangers.

Distinction between half and whole blood, how far exploded by recent enactments.—It will be proper, however, to remark here, that the distinction between a brother of the half blood, and one of the whole, is now very justly and happily exploded, so that now a brother of the half blood will be entitled to inherit next after any relation in the same degree of the whole blood, and his issue, where the common ancestor shall be a male, and next after the common ancestor, where such common ancestor shall be a female. (Stat. 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 106, s. 9.)

Estates may arise by implication from other devices in the same will.—An estate may also arise by implication, by reason of words of direct and immediate reference to other devices in the same will. Thus in Doe dem. Wight v. Cundall (9 East. 400) a testator devised thus:—"I give and bequeath unto the two children, Elizabeth and Joanna, daughters of my brother, William Wight, deceased, the first four freehold houses next my dwelling, built by me in 1770, when they have attained the age of twenty-one years; but the executor or executrix shall be accountable for the profits of the said houses until the said children attain the aforesaid age of twenty-one, or day of marriage; but if either of them should die before the age of twenty-one years, then the survivor shall be heir to the other two houses. Likewise I give and bequeath to the two children, Robert and Rebecca, son and daughter of my late brother Robert, deceased, the next four houses adjoining the same, on the same conditions as my brother William Wight's children." It was held that the fee passed which would go over to the survivor in case one died under twenty-one, and would descend or be disposable if he died attaining twenty-one; and that a devise of the other land to the two children of Robert on the same conditions as his brother William's children, was to receive a similar construction.

A reference to a person, as heir, may create an estate by implication.—So where a testator refers to a particular person as his heir, though mistaken as to the fact, such reference will be sufficient to create an estate by implication to the party referred to, without any words of express devise. As in Tilley v. Collyer, 3 Keb. 589, where a testator having issue by C. three daughters, S., A. and E. devised to C. for life, all his freehold wherever, until S. his heir, came to twenty-one, paying to the heir 10s. during the term, and to the rest after fifteen years old 20s. a piece, and the heir to pay to A and E 100l. a piece, 40l. at the decease of the wife, &c. and if S. his heir, died without heir before twenty-one, so that the lands descended and fell to A, then A to pay to E, &c.; Lord C. J. Hale held, that notwithstanding the testator was mistaken in his intent that his eldest daughter was his heir, that he intended his lands should go according to that mistake; therefore, albeit there was no express devise to S, yet she being named his heir, was sufficient to exclude the rest and make her sole heir. (See, also, Taylor v. Webb, Sty. 301.) And if a testator should refer to a disposition made by him, when, in fact, he has not made any such disposition at all, a devise may still arise by implication. Bibbs v. Wilker (Ambl. 661) is a case of this description. In that case a testator bequeathed one moiety of certain leasehold estates to E G, and, if he should die before twenty-one, to G S; and, if he should die before a certain event, to another person; and, after her death, to A; and provided that, in case A should die without issue, and E G or G S should be then living, or either of them, the said moiety of his leasehold messuages before given to the said A should go to E G and G S: Sir T. Sewell, M.R. said that, as there could be no doubt of the intention, and the words of gift being omitted by mistake, the Court would supply them, and would imply a gift to A and her issue, with contingent limitations over. But, generally speaking, a mere recital to give, without more, will not amount to a gift or demonstration of an intent to give. Thus, where B, by his will, reciting that he was entitled for life under the will of A to the advowson and rectory of D, with remainders over, "subject to a direction in the said will that my brother, J D, shall be presented to the said rectory when it shall next become vacant, which, it is my wish, may be complied with; now I hereby declare it to be my desire and earnest wish, that in case, upon the vacancy of the said living, the said J D shall not be then living, or in case the said rectory shall again become vacant, after the said J D shall have been presented to and accepted said presentation, then" A P was to be presented. The fact was, that under the will of A, J D was only entitled to the presentation on a contingency which had not happened. A question then arose, whether the expressions in the will of B raised a gift by implication so as to put the persons actually entitled under it to their election; and Lord Eldon, upon the grounds above alluded to, decided that they did not.

The same words operate differently when applicable to different kinds of property.—In order to ascertain the intention of the testator, the same words, when applied to different kinds of property, may receive a different construction with respect to the one, from what they would when applied to the other. Hence a limitation in the same terms which when applied to freehold property would have been considered to imply an indefinite failure of issue, when applying to leaseholds, have been construed to mean a dying without issue at the death of the first taker. The reason for adopting this construction is to give effect to the limitation over, which could not take effect in the case of leasehold property if the limitation over were only to take effect on an indefinite failure of issue in the first taker; for that would have been sufficient to confer an estate tail upon him in the case of freeholds, and would thus have brought the limitation within the long-established rule that where personal estate is bequeathed in terms that would have passed an estate tail in freehold property it will pass the absolute interest in leaseholds; the consequence of which would be, that all the ulterior limitations would be void. In order, therefore, to support these latter interests the Courts have adopted the principle above laid down. The case which best illustrates this doctrine is Forth v. Chapman, 1 P. Wms. 663. There a testator devised the residue of his real and personal estate to his nephews W. and G. and if either of them should depart this life and leave no issue of their respective bodies, then he gave the said premises to D; here Lord Parker observing that the devise carried a freehold as well as a leasehold interest, nevertheless thought it might be reasonable enough to take the same words in different senses as to the two different estates; and that as to the freehold the construction should be that if W. or G. died without issue generally, and as to the leasehold, the same words might be construed to mean a dying without issue living at the death. (Fearn v. E. 476; Harris v. Lincoln (Bishop of) 2 P. Wms. 140.) Since the statute 1 Vict. c. 26, it seems that this dying without issue would, in a devise subsequent to 1837, be confined to the death of the first taker in the freehold, as well as in the leasehold property (sect. 29); but as to wills made previously, the case of Forth v. Chapman affords an example in support of the proposition, that the same terms, even when used in the same instrument, if applied to different kinds of property, may pass a limited interest in the one case, and the absolute interest in the other.

Where lands are devised subject to a charge.—When lands are devised to a person without words of limitation, charged with the payment of a sum in gross (Collier's case, Cro. Eliz. 878; Frank v. Lee, 2 Show. 38; Read v. Hatton, 2 Mod. 25); or of debts and legacies, (Doe dem. Palmer v. Richards, 3 T. R. 356; Doe dem. Whitley v. Holmes, 8 T. R. 1); or of an annual sum (Webb v. Hearing, Cro. Jac. 114; Spicer v. Spicer, ib. 527; Read v. Hatton, 2 Mod. 25; Smith v. Tendall, 2 Salk. 685; Jenkins v. Jenkins, Willes, 635; Badeley v. Leapingwell, 3 Bur. 1553; Goodright dem. Baker v. Stocker, 5 T. R. 13; Andrew v. Southhouse, ib. 292; Frogmorton v. Holliday, 3 Bur. 1618); or the devisee is to give or relinquish a benefit, or to release a debt, or to buy an estate for another, he will take an estate in fee-simple (2 Rep. 21; 6 Rep. 16; 1 Roll Abr. 834; Green v. Armistead, Hob. 65); and it will make no difference whether the charge amounts to the annual rent or value of the land or not (Webb v. Hearing, Cro. Jac. 115; Smith v. Tendall, 2 Salk. 685); or the payment is only to continue during the life of another (Jenkins v. Jenkins, Willes, 635; Badeley v. Leapingwell, 3 Bur. 1553; Goodright dem. Baker v. Stocker, 5 T. R. 13; Frogmorton v. Holliday, 3 Bur. 1618); for the devise will be intended to have been designed for the benefit of the devisee; and if he had an estate for life only, he might die before he received the amount of the charges, and, consequently, might be a loser. But where the devisee was only to pay out of the rents and profits generally, or when, or as, or after they were received, it was considered unnecessary to extend the intention of the testator beyond the words of the will; consequently, he would have taken no more than a life estate; and the construction was the same where he was not to take until after the charges were satisfied. (Dickens v. Marshall, Cro. Eliz. 530; Deacon v. Marsh, Moor, 594; Fairfax v. Heron, Fre. Cha. 67; Canning v. Canning, Mosel. 240; Merson v. Blackmore, 2 Ask. 341; Denn dem. Moor v. Mellor, 5 T. R. 558; Doe dem. Small v. Allen, 8 T. R. 497; Doe dem. Bowes v. Blackett, Cow. 235; Doe dem. Briscoe v. Clark, 2 Bos. & Pull. N. R. 842; Doe dem. Am. Paddy v. Paddy, 4 East, 496; Doe dem. Jackson v. Ramsbottom, 3 Mau. and Selw. 516.) And if the charge is in a distinct clause, without any direction either expressly, or by construction, that the devisee is personally liable, a devise in fee would not be implied from such a charge. As, where a devise was to A, and B except 20l. to be paid out of E's part of the lands, it was held to pass an estate for life only; this being no charge on the estate in the hands of the devisee, but a charge antecedent to it. (Roe v. Dav, 3 Mau. and Selw. 518; see also Doe dem. Briscoe and Wife v. Clark, 2 Bos. and Pull. N. R. 343; Compton v. Compton, 9 East, 267.) And even where there is a personal charge on the devisee, and a testator may, nevertheless restrict the interest to a lesser estate than a fee, as by limiting his estate expressly for life or in tail; and even a devise to a man, his heirs, and assigns, subject to a charge, may be reduced to an estate tail by a clause which introduces another gift to commence on his death without issue. But this, it seems, it will not do as to wills made after 1837; because, by the express words of the new Will Act (sec. 29), the dying without issue must be construed as dying without issue at the time of the death of the party, which will create an estate in fee subject to a limitation over by way of executory devise, instead of an estate tail with a remainder over, which it must have been, had the limitation been construed, as it was formerly, to mean an indefinite purchase of issue in the first take.

MARKET VALUE OF LANDED PROPERTY.—An estate in the parish of Cherry Hinton, in the neighbourhood of Cambridge, was sold by auction on Monday, in eleven lots. The greater part of it is freehold, or equal thereto, and tithe free. Lot 1, two fields of arable land, consisting of 41a. 3r. 36p. of which 32a. 0r. 31p. are freehold, and 9a. 3r. 5p. copyhold, brought 2,680 guineas. Lot 4, a freehold meadow, tithe free, containing 7a. 2r. 15p. sold for 520 guineas. Lot 10, an inclosure of strong arable ground, containing 9a. 1r. 21p. more or less, brought 500 guineas. The averages of the 11 lots gave a result of 7½ guineas, or 75l. per acre. On Wednesday the manor of Chardstock was offered for sale by Messrs. Farebrother, Clark, and Lye. This estate is situated at the western extremity of the county of Dorset, and bounded in part by Devonshire and Somersetshire, and the river Axe, about three miles from Axminster. It consists of several farms, and the manor of Chardstock, with heriots, quit rents, &c. the manor and estate being held under lease from the Bishop of Salisbury for twenty-one years, renewable. The entire property yielded a rental of about 1,546l. per annum; but the estimated annual value of the copyhold estates, for which head rents were paid, was about 2,699l. The highest bidding was 29,000l. which, being under the reserved price, the estate was not sold. A second lot consisting of a cottage, and five acres of land, let at 21l. per ann. brought 420l. The same auctioneers sold the manor of Tarring, the annual income of which, in fines, heriots, &c. on an average of 16 years, amounted to 138l. 16s. for 2,470l. On Tuesday, in pursuance of an order from the High Court of Chancery, the commuted rent-charges, payable annually instead of tithe, derived from the parish of Wingham, Kent, were offered for sale at the Gray's Inn Coffee-house, Holborn. The property, comprising 276 acres, yields an annual rent of about 148l. and was put up in three lots, the yearly rentals of which were 44l. 13s., 49l. 11s. and 54l. 10s. respectively. The highest bidding was 2,220l. which the auctioneer intimated was below the price reserved, and consequently there was no sale.—On Wednesday Mr. Leifchild sold the Kearney estate, Kent, by auction. The estate is divided into several farms, and contains some good timber; the extent of the land is about 938 acres. It was sold in 17 lots. The first lot put up included Kearney Abbey, and 112 acres of meadow and arable land, and about 40 acres of plantations. It fetched 9,200l. Kearney Court, and its privileges and rights, with 280 acres, was sold for 8,250l. The whole amount realized by the sale was 36,660l.—On Thursday Mr. George Robins offered Lyptatt-park, Gloucestershire, for sale. The mansion attached to this estate has some stories of interest connected with it; for it is of very ancient origin, and is said to have been the residence of Sir J. Throckmorton, the projector of the gunpowder plot; and within its precincts he held many of the secret meetings preliminary to the carrying out of that plan. During the Commonwealth the estate suffered severe injury, and it was left to Sir Paul Bagot, with the assistance of Sir Jeffery Wyattville, to make it a fit residence for a noble family. Attached to this fine mansion are 231 acres of land, full of fine timber. The whole was bought in for 18,000l.

SALE OF THE ROYAL NAVAL CLUB, BOND-STREET.—On Wednesday the Royal Naval Club-house, with its contents, was sold by public auction in consequence of the dissolution of the club, by Mr. Lahee. The premises were formerly the banking-house of Messrs. Chambers, from whose trustees the members of the Naval Club purchased the lease for the sum of 10,000l. and are held on lease for a term of forty years from the City of London, at a ground-rent of 29l. 1s. 10d. from 1813. The lease is held in perpetuity on payment every fourteen years of a fine of 145l. 9s. 3d. The first offer for the lease was 5,000 guineas, and was eventually knocked down to Mr. John Leslie for 6,900l. In addition to the lease, the fine pictures presented by different members to the club were also sold, but fetched very low prices, in consequence of their large size. A full-length portrait of his Grace the Duke of Wellington, by Marton, for which the duke gave sixteen sittings, sold for 155 guineas; a portrait of Nelson, and a full-length portrait of William IV. Duke of Clarence, both by the same artist, sold for only 23 guineas. The most interesting lot in the day's sale were two autograph letters of Nelson, one written before the loss of his right arm, and the other afterwards, in an oak frame, made out of a plank of Nelson's ship Victory; it was purchased by Captain Sweeney for 7l. 10s.
